Obs. 11. The mixture of mercy and judgment is very comely. “Keep mercy and judgment.” The Scripture joins them very often: “I will sing of mercy and judgment,” Psal. ci. 1. “He that followeth after righteousness and mercy findeth life, righteousness, and honour,” Prov. xxi. 21. “Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness: he is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous,” Psal. cxii. 4. And in Jer. ix. 24, the Lord seems to glory in this his righteousness as well as in his mercy: saith the Lord. Let no man glory in the flesh; “but let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness, in the earth:” let him glory in this, that he knows that I am such a God; this is my glory, that I am both righteous and merciful.

Now for the several rules: First, When mercy should be shown. Secondly, When judgment should be executed. How men should be directed to mix both these together.

First, Mercy should be shown,

1. When men offend by infirmity, through weakness, and not through wilfulness.

Oh that we would consider of this! Our brethren that sometimes differ from us in judgment and in practice, consider, Do they appear, in any of their ways, to be wilful in their way? can you take it upon your consciences, that it is through obstinacy or any wicked principles that they walk otherwise than you? does it not appear in all their other ways that they walk humbly and conscientiously, that if they be in the wrong, yet it is through mere weakness that they cannot discern the truth, which thou thinkest thou dost see? Now thou shouldst be merciful towards them, and carry not thyself in a rigid, severe, bitter, and harsh way towards them, but in a merciful way; mercy when the offence arises from infirmity.

2. When the offender is already sensible of his offence.

3. When there may be as much good done by a fair, gentle, and merciful carriage, as by a harsh and rigid demeanor.

4. Especially when any begin to feel passion arise in their hearts, and a spirit of revenge to stir in them, above all times, then is the time for mercy. Examine thy heart, thou hast to deal with thy brother; now see whether there do not begin to arise passion and revenge in thy spirit towards him, now is the time for mercy; it is not the fit time for judgment, it is not a fit time to give judgment, nor for thee to execute judgment, but now is the time for mercy.

Secondly, Judgment should be “kept,” especially,

1. When called to manifest hatred against sin.

2. When the public good requires it; when you cannot be merciful to one, but you must be cruel to another. As in many things wherein men would be merciful, the truth is, the mercy they show to some is cruelty to others; and when thou hast the least interest in a business, then there is the most like to be the time for judgment.

“Keep mercy.”

“Keep;” not only do some acts of mercy, but “keep mercy.”

Many men, in some good moods, oh how pitiful are they! how merciful! but come to them at another time, and how rigid, how sour are they then! how bitter, how cruel, how harsh are they! We have found it so by experience. You can say of such a man, Oh! what sweet converse had we together, and what a sweet-tempered man he was! how loving, how meek, how gentle, how pitiful! But come to him now, how harsh and rugged! yea, extremely bitter in his expressions, mightily turned, as if he were not the same man. “Keep mercy,” keep it. Does God at any time melt thy heart, and make thee apprehensive of thy need of mercy? does thy heart begin to bleed towards thy brethren? O, keep it, keep this temper; the Lord keep this in the thoughts and purposes of thy heart for ever. It should be the care of Christians, not only to do that which is good, but to keep their hearts in such a constant frame. Oh that some of you would but call to mind the days of old! Was there not a time in which your hearts did melt towards your brethren, and you had sweet converse and communion with them; what is become of those spirits now? O, turn to that gracious, sweet temper again; and if ever God reduce you to that temper, keep it. Consider what is it that has changed my heart, what has brought me to it. Now if God does discover how thou hast lost that sweetness of thy heart, oh! labour to repent and turn to God, and resolve, If ever God bring me to that temper again, (as sometimes, through his mercy, I have felt,) I hope, through his grace, that I shall keep myself in that temper. Oh! how happy were it with us, if, when God brings our hearts into a good temper, we had but hearts to keep them in the same! "Keep mercy."

"And judgment." "Keep judgment" too. In some acts you find men very just, while in others they will be false enough. But now it should be our care to be as is said of God in Jer. 1. 7, "the habitation of justice;" so also it should be in the courts of justice, they should be indeed "the habitation of justice." Perhaps sometimes, in some one cause, a man may have justice in a court; yea, but if it be not so in all causes, and at all times, justice is not "kept." Justice should be always at home; a court should be always the habitation of judgment. And so it should be in families, and in individuals. It may be thou wert some time just in thy ways; yea, but then thou hadst not a temptation to unjust dealing. Some men, by a temptation, are brought to such unjust dealing, that if a man had said some years ago that thou wouldst have done such things, you would have been ready to exclaim, "What is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" 2 Kings viii. 13. When a man is once engaged in any unjust way, he will go on; therefore keep judgment.

"And wait on thy God continually." That is, do not satisfy yourselves in duties of mercy and judgment only, but worship God; for by waiting on God is meant the exercise of spiritual graces, wherein the worship of God consists, wherein we come to make God to be our God. As it is not enough for men to think they worship God, and yet make no conscience of the second table; so neither is it enough for men to make conscience of the second table, and not to worship God. It may be some of you are very just; yea, but what worship of God is there in your families, and in your own hearts? Do your souls worship God, and sanctify the name of God in all your ways? Therefore to the words, "Turn thou to thy God, keep mercy and judgment," is added, "and wait on thy God continually."

"Wait on thy God." Let us consider how we are to wait on God.

1. In faith. The basis or foundation of waiting, is faith; to believe there is good in God, help, supply in him, and in him alone, however contrary things seem to be. I believe there is help in God alone, and not in those base ways into which my corrupt heart before led me.

2. In the use of the means which God has appointed for the attaining of my desires.

3. In an earnest looking out for mercy. I believe here is mercy, and no where else; I attend on God for it in the use of these means, and I look out for mercy.

4. In quiet submission in the mean time, though God stays long. That is true waiting, not to be discontented, not to have my heart sink, though God stays long.

5. In seeking God all the while. That soul that does this, may be said to wait on God.

Obs. 12. A turning heart is a waiting heart. The heart that turns truly to God is taken off from all creature contentments, so as to rest in them, and looks up to God for all help, and for all supply. And this waiting is of very great use to those that are turning to God. Consider of it; is any of you about the work of turning to God? has God begun to make a turn in any of your hearts? Know, that when you are turning to God, you are very like to meet with a great many things that may discourage you, many suggestions of the devil; and your own hearts: Why should not I go back again? What good have I gotten by reading and praying? I get nothing by it, all will come to nothing at last. Temptations are like to come thick and threefold upon the heart of a sinner turning to God. I am confident I am speaking in this to the hearts of all that know what it is to turn to God; there was a time that thou wert departing from God, and then thou wentest on quietly, but ever since God has begun to turn thy heart, oh the thick and threefold temptations of the devil that have come to thee! Now this is a very seasonable exhortation; Turn to God and wait upon him, be not discouraged; notwithstanding all difficulties, fears, temptations, and discouragements, from men, and devils, and thine own heart, yet wait upon God and keep in his way.

Oh! it had been happy had this exhortation been set home upon the spirits of many to whose hearts the Lord was beginning to give a turn. Not long since the Lord was beginning to turn thy heart to himself, and thou didst meet with some things that discouraged thee, which has turned thee quite off again. Oh! had but this exhortation come seasonably then, "Turn thou to thy God, and wait upon him;" oh! it had been happy for thee. The Lord make it seasonable now to thee! Oh! remember this text, "Turn thou to thy God," and "wait upon him continually."

"Wait." Oh! there is reason that thou shouldst wait upon God. Thou sayest, If I had comfort, and if I were sure I should be saved at last, though I have discouragements from men, yet, if I had but comfort from God, then I could be content; yea, but wait, wait for comfort, wait for peace, wait for assurance; God is a great God, and is worthy to be waited on. There are some reasons why we should wait upon God.

1. Men that are above others will take state upon them, and they will be waited on. God is great, and therefore wait upon him.

2. We are vile creatures and unworthy, and therefore let us wait. If a beggar should rap and rap, and you come and see it to be a beggar, your heart rises upon him; if he beg, he must wait if you be busy. We are beggars, and therefore it is fit we should wait.

3. God has waited on us a long time. How long did God wait upon thee? It may be thou wert twenty years old before thou didst begin to turn to God, perhaps thou wert thirty or forty years old, and God was waiting upon thee to be gracious all that time; God was waiting for opportunity to do thee good, therefore wait thou now upon God.

4. What we wait for is worth our waiting. If a man believed there were nothing but scraps to be had at last, then he would not wait so long; but if he hoped some great thing was to be gotten, then he would wait. When beggars come to a mean house, they knock at the door and stay a little, and if they give them nothing, away they will go; but if they come to great houses, or coaches, they will wait, though it be long, and run a great way after them. That which we wait for is worth thousands of worlds; we wait for the pardon of sin, we wait for the assurance of God's love, we wait for the shedding abroad of the Holy Ghost in our hearts; we wait for rich treasure, and know that there is enough to be had in God: your waiting will pay for all.

5. It is a great part of God's worship to wait upon him. It is not the worship of God, only to pray, and hear the word, and receive sacraments; but when you are waiting you are worshipping of God.

6. God is all this while preparing mercy for you. Suppose a scrivener write something for you; well, the thing is not yet done; yea, but he is writing as fast as he can. Know, O thou soul who art turning to God, all the while thou art waiting God is working; God is setting all his attributes on work for thy good while thou art waiting, and therefore wait on thy God.

7. God is infinitely wise, and he knows when it is best for us to have the mercy, he knows the times and seasons; wait then still upon God, for "the Lord is a God of judgment." Alas! we are hasty, we cannot judge when the time is fittest, but God is "a God of judgment," and therefore wait upon him: should we have a mercy just when we would, our mercy would undo us, and therefore let us wait.

O my brethren, we have as much encouragement here in this land to wait upon God as ever any people had. We would fain have had the wars ended, and we began to murmur and repine because it was not done, Oh, but we will not wait; therefore we will not turn; and those that turn to God least will wait least upon him, and those that turn to God most will wait most upon him. Do not you see that God has wrought abundance of good for us by deferring what we would have? Suppose we had had no opposition at the beginning of the parliament, but that the king had agreed, and said, You shall have your desires. Our desires then were limited to some few things, as the abolition of ship money, tonnage and poundage of monopolies, &c., and the granting of triennial parliaments, and the like. Now what abundance has God wrought by deferring what we would have had! Oh, it is good for people to wait upon God. Let us look back to our murmurings and repinings all this while; true, we have suffered something; yea, but has not God wrought good out of our sufferings? And suppose there should be fears of new storms arising, oh, let us not say we will wait no longer. Take heed of foolish resolutions of your own. God is wisest, leave God to do his own work; keep the way of God and go on in your duty, and then let God work his own ends, either by war or peace, as he pleases, only "wait thou upon thy God."

"Continually." It is fit for us to wait. Yea, but we have waited a long time. Well, but yet know that you are at the right door. Suppose a man be knocking at a door, and he has knocked a great while and nobody comes, he begins to think it is not the right door, but somebody tells him that it is, and thereon he stays: so we may assure our hearts thus much, we are at the right door certainly, and let us not think to go away, we shall find somebody within, God will appear at length. What! shall we lose all for want of waiting a little while longer? Thus it is with many wretched apostates, that have taken a great deal of pains in seeking after God a great while, and for want of waiting a little longer they have lost all. Oh, let there be this resolution in your hearts, if I die and perish, yet I will die and perish waiting upon God. Certainly the soul which has this resolution will never come to despair; yea, there is no such way for the hastening of mercy, as for a soul to lie flat at the feet of God: Let God do what he will with me; if I perish, I will perish waiting upon him; though he kills me, I will trust in him, and stay upon him. You have waited; how long, I pray? Oh, you have been waiting and seeking God it may be this half year, or twelve months. What is that, I pray? O thou wretched soul! thou hast deserved eternal flames, and wilt thou grudge waiting on God a few years? If God would keep thee waiting all thy days, (as he has done many,) and at the last manifest himself unto thee, thou hast cause to bless God for ever; and therefore do not grudge though thou hast been waiting a while, and it may be, though thy time is come, yet God's time is not come. The time which you call long, God calls not so; one day with God is as a thousand years; it is no time with God, and therefore do not complain of the length of thy time. But for waiting, and that "continually," there are further reasons.

1. Your betters have waited longer. Read but Psal. lxxxviii., and there you will find one better than you who waited all his time. The Lord was pleased to work grace upon him when he was young, his heart was turned to God then; and you may find in the text, that from his youth up, the terrors of God were upon him. "Wait thou upon thy God continually."

2. You cannot better yourself. Whither wilt thou go, poor soul? now you are seeking God, you have not what you would have, whither will you go? You may mend yourself any way? if you cannot, then wait upon God "continually."

3. It may be before God began to turn thy heart, thou didst think mercy was easy to be obtained, that it was nothing to believe; thou didst wonder that people spake so much of the hardness of believing, in thine eyes it was easy. Well, the Lord is now working upon thy heart, and would humble thee for those slight thoughts which thou hadst of faith; the Lord will have thee to know, that believing in his grace requires a mighty work of God, even the same power which raised Jesus Christ from the dead. Be humbled for thy slight thoughts about the work of faith, and know, that this (it may be) is the thing which God intends in so long keeping thee so low, that thou mayst come to see that faith requires the mighty power of God to work it; that so thou mayst give glory to God whenever thy heart shall be raised by the work of faith to believe in him, and to be enabled to triumph in him, and say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited on him," and this is the God of my salvation. And therefore, you that are turning to God, wait upon your God continually.

Ver. 7. He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress.

This scripture, though it seem somewhat harsh, and hard to read, yet it may be a good providence of God that has brought it before us at this time.

The scope of the prophet and connexion here is, We may exhort, but so long as their hearts are covetous, and set upon their way of getting gain, they will never regard what we say; they will not turn to God, they will not hear of it, but will rather turn a deaf ear to all entreaties. This indeed is the guise of men who have great dealings in the world, and whose hearts are set upon their riches, let the most glorious truths possible be set before them, yet they are as nothing to them. We read in Luke xvi. of Christ himself preaching before a company of men, and some of them being very covetous; mark what the text saith, ver. 14, "And the Pharisees also, who were covetous, heard all these things: and they derided him," they blew their noses at him, so the word signifies, they scorned him. Christ spake of excellent and ἔξουσιπρήξον. divine mysteries, some of his auditors had dealings in the world, and great estates, and they scoffed at his words: Tell us of such things as these! tell us of ways of gain, how we may come to enrich ourselves. Similar seems to have been the disposition of some of the auditors of Hosea at this time, therefore saith he,

"He is a merchant." The word כַּנְיָ here translated "a merchant," signifies a Canaanite, and may be rendered according to the very letter, He is a Canaanite, for in Hebrew the word for Canaanite and merchant is the same. Thus Job xli. 6, "Shall they part him among the merchants?" among the Canaanites: and Prov. xxxi. 24, She "delivereth girdles unto the merchants;" the Hebrew is, to the Canaanites. Now the reason why a merchant and a Canaanite are synonymous in Scripture is, because the country of Canaan was much given to merchandise, and indeed much to deceit. As astrologers were called Chaldeans, because Chaldea was famous for mathematicians; and robbers and thieves were called Arabians, because the inhabitants of Arabia were addicted to theft; so because Canaan had so many merchants, therefore a Canaanite and a merchant were designated by the same term.

But here the Holy Ghost calls them not Israelites, mark, he saith not, You are an Israelite, but a Canaanite; and that by way of upbraiding them, as if because they had degenerated so much from Israel, spoken of before, he would not call them Israelites, but Canaanites.

Obs. 1. Men by their sin may lose the honour of their progenitors.

Obs. 2. Though the calling of a merchant is not only a lawful, but a very honourable employment, yet the abuse of it may make it very contemptible. If it be abused and corrupted it may become very contemptible; for so here the Holy Ghost does cast such a word upon them, to show how, through their corruption, they had rendered contemptible a calling that was honourable, and brought ignominy upon themselves; for though merchants that are subtle may, in the pride of their hearts, rejoice in their craft and cunning, and think that they can circumvent others by their deceit, and get money by over-reaching them, they may glory in this, as if it were a great excellency in them, but the Holy Ghost casts contempt upon those; "He is a merchant," a Canaanite, and "the balances of deceit are in his hand."

"The balances of deceit are in his hand." The Lord abhorred their "balances of deceit," yea, and professed that they are an abomination to him, if you read Lev. xix. 35, 36, "Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the Lord," I am Jehovah. If you will acknowledge me to be the Lord, to be Jehovah, be just in your dealing, have no unjust balances, let there be no injustice in your trading. And in Deut. xxv. 13—16, "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously," (mark,) "are an abomination to the Lord thy God." Much stress is laid upon it. You think you may take liberty in such things. No, saith the text, all that do such things are "an abomination to the Lord thy God;" deceit in trading is not only a thing that God forbids, but a thing that God abominates. Dost thou profess any interest in God? hast thou any hope that God should be merciful to thy soul, to do thee any good? dost thou think that God is thy God? know, this is an abomination then to thy God, to that God in whom thou professest to have some interest. Prov. xi. 1 confirms this, "A false balance is abomination to the Lord; but a just weight is his delight," God takes pleasure in that.

"The balances of deceit." We are to regard this as a synecdoche for all kinds of deceit in trading, though only balances are here mentioned; not only deceitful balances, but measures, and tale, and lights, and mixtures, when they shall mix water and other things with any commodity to make it heavier, or mix bad with good ware, or, by some of their many arts, put a deceitful gloss and appearance on things; or use deceitful words, and make many protestations, yea, even swear deceitful oaths, with regard to the original cost and quality; and deceitful books, and deceitful reckonings; all such things are here condemned, and he who practises them is termed "a Canaanite." Yet those have their due honour that are righteous in their dealing; but such as make profession of merchandise, and are not righteous in their dealings, cannot think much that the Scripture should call them, by way of upbraiding, "a Canaanite."

Even a joining with others in deceit is included in this: as if a man, who knows the way they take is to cozen others, yet to get gain he will be content to join with them to partake a part of their gain: these things, and perhaps your own consciences would tell you of abundant more that you know of, of the mysteries of iniquity that there are in trading. As we read of those in the Revelation, that were under the power of antichrist, they might not buy nor sell, except they had the mark of the beast upon them. And the truth is, among a great part, if not most, of our buyers and sellers, there is the mark of the beast upon them, deceitfulness and falseness among them; and because this is thought to be so light a matter, therefore the Scripture lays the more weight upon it. And so much as the time will give me leave, I shall labour to lay some weight upon this, of deceitfulness in ways of trading.

"The balances of deceit are in his hand." Hereby (saith a learned interpreter on the place) is intimated a continual and perpetual study and endeavour to deceive, he has it at hand, it is in his hand continually.

In the forecited place, Deut. xxv., men are forbidden to have a false weight in their bag; you must not keep a false weight in your house, much less in your hand.

Or, it may be, he alludes to those that have a sleight of hand to make the balances turn one way or the other, so that their customers shall not perceive it.

"He loveth to oppress." What oppression is there in trading? If I buy a commodity and sell it again, what oppression can there be? There may be oppression in trading, as thus:

1. In monopolizing commodities. When a few men get a trade into their own hand, and make such use of it for themselves that poor men who have been brought up to it, and have no other means of livelihood, are not able to live by it, this is oppression. Certainly this monopolizing in trading is a great oppression: the Lord has in great measure delivered us from it, but yet not wholly, there is a great cry against it in many parts of the land still.

2. When men take the advantages of the weaknesses of those with whom they deal in their trading; but especially when they take advantage of men's necessities, that is, if such a man must sell his commodity, now for men to take advantage of his necessity, and therefore beat it down, so as even almost to undo a man in the very things he is necessitated to sell. I verily believe you know the meaning of such things as these are.

Or now, those who work upon the like necessity in buying, as sometimes when men must at a certain season bring over certain commodities, you will let them lie to the last, that so you may have them at any rate; and so when you come to know that men must needs have a commodity of you, then to raise the price so as they cannot live upon it, this is even to drink their very blood, this is oppression.

3. In wronging the poor of their rightful wages. There are many poor men, that are servants to you who are merchants and tradesmen, they live upon their labour, and they must come and fetch commodities of you, that they may live; now you, knowing their necessity, that they must have your work, therefore beat down their wages, and give not unto them so that they may maintain their families. You will say, I do not wrong them, if they do not, others will. It may be, but it does not excuse you.

4. In the oppression of debtors. When tradesmen have gotten poor men into their debts, then they will make them that they shall buy of them, and of none other, and so will put off on them their braided ware, and that at a dear rate. You will say, We sell it them. Yea, but you force them to buy of you; for if they should go from you, then you fall upon them, and put them into prison, or evil treat them some other way. This is to love to oppress, to take the advantage of men's necessities when they are grown poor. Certainly these things are grievous to the Spirit, and abominable in the eyes of God. These are rebuked here; and that you may see that there is a great deal of evil in these "balances of deceit," and oppression in trading, do but consider these particulars:

Insuper continuum ac perpetuum studium. Meos. in loc.

1. Observe how this is introduced in my text, as opposite to turning to God. "Turn thou to thy God;" then presently, "He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand; he loveth to oppress." Those who endeavour to get gain to themselves by any deceit or oppression, these are men that yet have not turned to God. Thou hast not turned to Jehovah, thy heart is not turned to him, thy heart is turned to the earth, the earth is thy portion, and the things of the earth thine inheritance; it is not God that thou hast chosen, thou hast not turned unto him.

2. Thou dost certainly not know the nature of sin, who darest venture the least sin for the greatest gain; had God ever enlightened and awakened thy conscience to see the true nature of sin, thou wouldst rather lose all thy estate, and be clothed with rags all thy days, than willingly commit the least sin to get the greatest estate. It was a saying of Austin, That there must not be so much as an officious lie; that is, a lie when a man intends no hurt, but good; yet this must not be told, saith he, no, not to save the souls of all the world. Surely then a lie must not be told to get twelve pence in a bargain, or five shillings, or fifty shillings, or five pounds; it must not be told to save the souls of all in the world. Now to tell a lie to deceive others as well as thyself, surely God has not yet laid the weight of sin upon your souls; the day is yet to come, that you shall know (perhaps to all eternity) what the weight and burden of sin mean.

3. Certainly you do not trust in God; you may speak of trusting in God, but it is apparent by this, that you have jealous thoughts of God, that you do not believe that God takes care of you. And here is not only sin, but an evidence of your misery; you are in such a condition, that your own consciences condemn you, and tell you that God takes no care of you, for did you believe that God cared for you, had a care over your body, estate, and soul, then wouldst thou leave all to God; I will cast my care upon God, I will go on in God's way, and leave all other things to him. But now, when a man is low in the world, and would fain rise higher, or would provide a certain portion for his children, and he falls to deceiving, and thinks to obtain it that way, the plain explicit English of it is, For my part, I dare not trust God to take care for me, and that which I think God does for me is not enough; if I trust to God's blessing, I may be a poor man, my children may be poor: I dare not then trust to promises, nor protections, nor providences, but I must take my own way. The truth is, the language practically amounts to this, I cannot get an estate by God, and therefore I will see what I can do by the devil.

4. All duties of religion that thou performest are rejected by God. You who are conscious to yourselves of falseness in your trading, and, it may be, have gone on many days and years in your ways, I say, all the duties of religion that you perform are rejected by God; you will deceive, and yet come to hear, and deceive again, and yet hear, and so make the duties of religion subserve as a colour to your deceit. Who would suspect that a man so forward in matters of religion should be so deceitful? Oh! cursed is that wickedness above all wickedness; it is aggravated by this, when thou makest religion to be a colour of deceit, know that God casts all thy profession and duties as filth and dung back again in your face. "Thou hast," saith Ezek. xxviii. 18, "defiled thy sanctuaries;" how? "by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic." By the iniquity of thy traffic thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries. You go abroad, and there you traffic, and deceive, and put off false commodities, and have false reckonings, and the like: now you come into the sanctuary; oh, but you defile the sanctuary by the multitude of your iniquity; and among other iniquities, the iniquity of your traffic is that which especially defiles the ordinances of God to you. In Micah vi. 8, when those hypocrites had said, What shall we do? shall we come with "thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil?" saith the prophet, "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly," &c. ? As if he should say, Though you come with all these things, it is all to no purpose, whatsoever offerings you offer to God, it is all nothing, except you "do justly."

5. There is a curse mingled with every thing which thou dost enjoy. Though, it may be, some things are gotten honestly, yet (I say) there is a curse mingled in all things thou doest, it venoms and poisons every thing thou doest. In Zech. v. 2, 3, there was a flying roll of twenty cubits, and the breadth of it ten cubits: "then said he unto me, This is the curse that goeth forth over the face of the whole earth;" for whom? "for every one that stealeth shall be cut off," &c. Every bit of meat which thou dost eat at thy table, thou mayst look upon as dipped in the curse of God: I have gotten this by deceit. Thou wouldst be loth to have every bit of meat rolled up in dirt and so put into thy mouth; but know, O fraudulent man! thine every bit of meat is rolled up in the curse of God.

6. Surely thou, who art guilty of this deceit in the way of trading, canst not pray if thou comest to prayer; surely thy conscience is very blind, for when thou art conscious to thyself of deceit, how canst thou come into the presence of a righteous God? Canst thou say, O righteous Father? darest thou come into the presence of such a holy and righteous God, who professes to abominate thy ways? Surely thy conscience must be very blind, if thou dost not understand the evil of thy sin. It may be, at first, in thy trading, thy conscience did trouble thee for a little time, thou hadst misgiving thoughts; but thou hast worn them out, and so art ready to bless thyself that thou hast gotten over such a difficulty as that is: thy condition is far worse. Or if not, if thy conscience be not seared with a hot iron, then thou wilt be terrified. I verily think that those who have any light left in them dare not go to prayers. Oh! dost thou so prize a little gain, as to take away the freedom of thy spirit, and the holy boldness of thy heart in prayer? Oh how shouldst thou say to gain, Get thee hence as a menstruous cloth!

7. Know, that if thou shouldst come to make use of thy estate in any good work, God rejects it. Isa. lxi. 8, "For I the Lord love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt-offering." What! will you get by deceit an estate, and come and offer it to me? I abhor it, saith God. Chrysostom saith, Why dost thou despise and dishonour God thus, in bringing unclean things to him? it is a reproach to God: a man who has gotten an estate by deceit, if he brings his estate to any service of God, he thereby reproaches God.

8. Know that God will avenge such things. It may be the poor man whom thou oppress in thy trading cannot right himself upon thee, because a bargain is a bargain, you will say. Yea, but God will come over with the bargain again; it may be you have done with him in your bargain, but God has not done with you.

You will say to him, You saw what it was, and you bought the thing of me as it was, and I have nothing to say to you; but God has much to say to you on this point. Mark those two scriptures: first, in Micah vi., the Lord having shown what he did require, that men should be just in their ways, adds, in ver. 11—13, "Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights? for the rich men thereof are full of violence, and the inhabitants thereof have spoken lies, and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth. Therefore also will I make thee sick in smiting thee." O, when God comes to smite thee, he will make thee sick to purpose; sickness to such men as have defiled consciences in their trading is dreadful sickness indeed: as if God should say, You shall have no great content in what you have; I will be avenged on you for what you do; either you or your heirs shall not enjoy it. But the second text is one which concerns Christians very much, a place that cannot possibly have escaped the notice of those of you that are exercised in Scripture, 1 Thess. iv. 6, "That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter." You must not go beyond your brother. Your brother is weak; you will say, Let the weaker look to it as well as he can. No, you must not take advantage of his weakness, he is your brother; you must not defraud him, no, not "in any matter:" why? "because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified."

And know, this day the Lord forewarns you once more, and by the ministry of his word does testify against you in this respect; and if you will go on in any way of deceit, you go on against the very strength of the word and strength of conscience this day, and this word preached this day to you shall certainly testify against you another day.

9. How terrible will death be to such men, when they shall leave the sweet of all their estates, and carry nothing but the guilt of all with them! In Job xxvii. 8, "What is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?" Sometimes men seek to deceive, and they are discovered, and so rendered base and contemptible to all the world; yea, but sometimes they may carry it so cunningly, that they shall never be discovered perhaps in this world, but they shall gain, and say with Ephraim here, "I am become rich, I have found me out substance;" but "what is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained?" what profit shall it be, though thou hast gained the whole world and thou shalt lose thy own soul?

10. Thou must restore, if thou hast any estate now, or if thou dost ever get one; restoration must be made, or thou canst not expect to find mercy from God, all thy sorrow, cries, and prayers are vain; without restitution, there cannot be expectation of pardon and forgiveness. The ancient speech that all divines in all ages of the church have closed withal was, There must be restitution of that which is falsely gotten; if it be in thy power to do it, thou must restore it, or else thou canst not have any hope of mercy; those sweet morsels which you have swallowed must be vomited up again. And therefore, you that are apprentices, take heed of being deceitful to please your masters, for if you have a hand in it you must restore. I will give you Scripture and reason, why it is impossible that any kind of repentance can be accepted of God without restitution.

1. Because, if I have power to restore, all the while I do not restore I continue in the sin; I do not only wrong the man—just the very hour I have deceived him, but all the while I keep that which is his in my hand: this is the reason why that repentance can never be accepted of God, which consists with a wilful continuance in the sin that a man seems to repent of. Do I repent of my sin, and yet wilfully continue in the sin? I say, wilful, for I have it in my hand to restore. O, but I shall undo myself. Yea, but that is wilful still; is it better for thee to keep an estate or to keep a sin? Now, certainly any man that has any light must needs acknowledge thus much, That if I truly repent me of my sin, I must, as far as I possibly can, undo my sin; can I say, I am heartily sorry for a sin, when I do not what I can to undo that sin?

2. There are divers scriptures commanding restitution; I will give you two or three. Ezek. xxxiii. 14, 15, "Again, when I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; if he turn from his sin, and do that which is lawful and right; if the wicked restore the pledge, give again that he had robbed, walk in the statutes of life, without committing iniquity; he shall surely live, he shall not die." He does not "walk in the statutes of life," except he "give again that he had robbed." So in Numb. v. 6, 7, you have the law about restitution: "When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord, and that person be guilty; then they shall confess their sin which they have done." Is this all? No; mark: "and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed." He must confess his sin; yea, but that is not enough, he must recompense the party. This is a most excellent scripture. Mark, it is said here, "If a man shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord;" it is not only against man, but "against the Lord," against the rule of justice which the Lord has set for the maintaining of order and human society in the world. And then observe further: "If a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass." You will say, I do no other than all tradesmen do. Mark the text, "If a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit," as if the Holy Ghost should say, I confess it is a common sin, but though it be ordinarily committed by men, though there should be confession of that sin, yet if there be not restitution, it will do you little good. I remember Latimer, in one of the sermons that he preached before King Edward, speaking of this very point of restitution, saith, that the first day that he preached about it there came one and gave him twenty pounds to restore; the next time he preached another brought him thirty pounds; and on another occasion there came another and gave him two hundred pounds ten shillings. He uses this homely expression, "Restore what you have gotten, else you will cough in hell, and the devils will laugh at you." Certainly it is that which will lie heavy upon conscience; gravel in the kidneys will not grate so upon you as a little guilt on your consciences. I myself knew one man who had wronged another but of five shillings, and it seems he did not much regard it, the sum being so small; yet God awakening his conscience fifty years after, he could not rest till he had restored that five shillings. And therefore know, that though it be many years since you have gotten any thing by deceit and wrong, yet God will (if he has a love to you) constrain you to restore it. Oh what foolish lusts are the lusts of covetousness! As the apostle saith, Those that will be rich fall into many foolish lusts: this sin of covetousness and deceitfulness brings men into foolish lusts, and makes men pierce themselves through with many sorrows. And oh that God would pierce them with some sorrow this day, that they might never have one night's quiet rest, till they at least resolve in their hearts that they will commence the work of restitution.

And even those of you that have made false agreements with your creditors, if God awakens your consciences, I see not how you can quiet them till you satisfy your creditors: these things will not be peace another day.

Now the Lord convince those that, hearing the word of God, are guilty, and know that God will call for an account of this thing, and of this text that through providence has been preached to them this day.

Ver. 8. And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance: in all my labours they shall find none iniquity in me that were sin.

In the verse before Ephraim is charged for being a "merchant," for having "the balances of deceit in his hand," and loving to oppress. But "Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich."

"Yet." The participle  $\pi\alpha$  signifies, here, nevertheless; as if they should say, Let the prophet say what he will, let him inveigh against me as he pleases, I know not what he means by his deceit and oppression, I am sure I gain well by it. "Yet I am become rich; I am sure I prosper in this way, and that is enough for me.

"I have found me out substance." The word  $\pi\alpha$  here translated "substance," signifies sometimes iniquity, labour, violence, rapine, affliction, riches, an idol; all these things this word signifies: indeed most of them, if not all, are usually accompaniments of riches in the hands of the wicked.

The Greeks call riches ἀναψυχή, rest, refreshing to the soul. They account the great refreshing and rest to their souls to be in their riches, however acquired.

"Substance." Those things which the prophet tells us of are but notions, imaginations; but in what I have found there is "substance;" to have an estate, and riches, and incomings, in them is substance. "I have found me out substance." Hence,

Obs. 1. Wicked men will have something to say for themselves, though their ways be never so foul. The prophet brings heavy charges against them, "the balances of deceit;" and loving to oppress, and other sins before named; yet Ephraim saith; he hath somewhat to say. It is a very hard thing to stop the mouths of wicked men, and especially of the rich wicked; wicked men that prosper in their wickedness, say what you will, you cannot stop their mouths. The work of conversion is not so much as begun till the mouths of sinners be stopped, till they be so convinced of their evil ways that they have nothing to say for themselves.

Obs. 2. Wicked men may prosper for a while in their evil courses. "Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich." It is true, sometimes God meets with wicked men, and curses them in their way, so that they have not their desire satisfied; but often they have, they do become rich, they get their hearts' desires: Job xxi.; Psal. lxxiii., and many other places.

Obs. 3. Wicked men attribute to themselves their prosperity and riches. "I am become rich, I have found substance." They do not look up to God, indeed they dare not; those whose gains are sinful, dare not acknowledge God in them. This is the evil of getting any thing in a way of sin, that a man cannot come to God and say, Lord, I bless thee that thou hast given me this. No, his conscience would fly in his face. Wicked men attribute all to themselves: this is a very wicked and vile thing. Deut. vi. 12, "Then" (speaking of their having houses and lands in Canaan) "be ware lest thou forget the Lord," and only look at thyself, and attribute all to thyself. The "great and goodly cities," "and houses full of all good things," are given to thee by the Lord thy God, "which sware unto thy fathers."

Obs. 4. Carnal hearts account riches the only substantial things. "I have found me out substance." They think there is no substance in other things. You speak of spiritual things, of communion with God, of faith in Jesus Christ, and of the promises, they are but poor dry things, that have no substance in them; but tell me of gain, and incomings, there is some savour there, in them there is substance. Indeed nothing gives substance to spiritual things but faith: in Heb. xi. 1, "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Faith gives a substance to things spiritual, a believer looks upon them as substantial, and regards these outward things as imaginary. Carnal hearts think spiritual things imaginary, and an outward estate substantial: the word of God is quite contrary to these. Thus in Prov. viii. 21, wisdom saith, "That I may cause those that love me to inherit substance;" that is, as if nothing had a substance but only that which comes in by wisdom, by grace. We call rich men substantial men; Such a man, we say, is a substantial man; for indeed all the substance that the world looks after is riches, they account them substance.

Obs. 5. Carnal hearts much glory in their possessions. "I am become rich, I have found me out substance." They make their boast in what they have got, they bless themselves in their way. In Zeph. i. 9, it is spoken of the very servants of rich, covetous men, who seek to get an estate but to their masters, in a way either of violence or of deceit, they "leap on the threshold." They triumph, and leap in their rejoicings, that they have circumvented others, that they have got such and such things to their masters; much more then will the masters themselves leap and rejoice in the having their hearts' desires filled: they glory in it.

Obs. 6. Carnal hearts, that have gotten estates by sinful means, seek to relieve their guilty consciences with the consideration of the outward comforts they enjoy. The prophet charges them with their sin, charges the guilt of their sin upon them. But we are rich, say they, and we inherit substance. Wicked men will seek to relieve their consciences, their guilty consciences, by rejoicing in their riches, and in their estates, and in what they have got. In Isa. lviii. 10, you have a scripture somewhat suitable to this; "Thou hast found the life of thine hand; therefore thou wast not grieved." It may be, if a man goes on in an evil way, and does not prosper in it, God crossing him, then he begins to bethink himself, Is not this a sinful way? does not God oppose me in it? and then he begins to be grieved. But if he can find the life of his hand go on, and he prosper and have what he desires, then he will not be grieved, then his heart is hardened. Wicked men will set their riches and estates against all their guiltiness, and think they will countervail it. I beseech you, weigh this matter well, consider that there is no more full and sure sign of a worldly man than this, that he can think to relieve his conscience in the guilt of the least sin, by the enjoyment of the things of the world; that he can set the good things of the world against the guilt of sin, that he can put any thing in the world in the balance to down-weigh the least guilt of any sin. Herein is evidenced a worldly, wretched heart: thou dost bless thyself in thy great estate, but hast thou contracted no guilt at all in its acquisition? Thou canst not say but some guiltiness has been contracted; yea, but this contents thee, so much gain has been the result. Oh! thou art a wretched man, that canst set the gain in the world against the least guilt that thou hast contracted. Oh! it has been an ill bargain, riches got by guilt; thou hast made (I say) an ill bargain for thyself. Thou knowest not God, knowest not with whom thou hast to deal, that canst set any gain by sin for to countervail the evil of that guilt that thou hast committed for the getting of that gain of thine.

Obs. 7. Wicked men labour to persuade themselves that God is not altogether so displeased with them as many would persuade them. Surely, if my condition were so dangerous as you would persuade me to, I should not prosper so much in my way as I do, I should not get riches so as I do. Upon this they begin to think that God is of their mind, as in Psal. l. 21, "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such an one as thyself." We find by experience that when men are under affliction, when God's hand is upon them, they begin to think that he does not like their ways; but when they go on and prosper they are ready to think that God approves. There is a notable story concerning the mother of Lombard, Gratian, and Comestor, (the first, the Master of the Sentences; the second, the compiler of a great part of the pope's law, the Decretal Epistles; the third, the author of the Scholastical History, the best man and book of the three,) all famous men, and all three bastards; now when their mother came to make her confession to the priest, she could not acknowledge much evil in her whoredoms, nor find her heart much grieved or troubled on account of them; and when the priest urged her to repent and do penance, she replied that the thing might be evil which she did, yet that the prosperity and eminent usefulness of three such sons might well cover her transgressions. Thus it is ordinarily; men think the magnitude of the sin lessened by the greatness of the success. The people they may laugh at me, (saith a covetous man,) but I

*Populus me sublat,
at mala plando fiver, domi simul ac nummos contempr in arck. Hor.*

applaud myself at home, as I contemplate the money in the chest; so long as I see comings-in, let men talk what they will, I cannot believe that things are so bad as they report, that God is so much against me, my prosperity surely is an indication of his favour.

Of Dionysius it is related, that when he had committed sacrilege, and had a good voyage after it, he said, You tell me of sacrilege, but see what a good voyage

the gods themselves have granted me. Oh, these are heathenish reasonings, and yet I fear they are not altogether rooted out of such as profess themselves Christians. "Ye who go down to the sea in ships, who do business in great waters," it may be if you meet with an ill voyage, then you begin to recollect yourself, What sin have I been guilty of? but now, if your voyage be prosperous, though you have contracted much guilt upon your spirits while you were at land, yet prospering in your voyage, you never think but all is well. Oh no, a good voyage is no sign of the absence of guilt; as sometimes I have told you, that a painted face is no sign of a good complexion; it may be it is the curse of God upon thee that does let thee so to prosper; and if God had any love to thee, he would not let thee to prosper so, he would cross thee in thy ways, that so thou mightest bethink thyself. Another, perhaps, has been as wicked as thou, and yet the Lord had a love to him, and he crossed him in his ways, so that he has begun to bethink himself, and cannot rest till he gets the guilt of his sin done away; but for thee, God's heart it seems is not yet towards thee, he has no love to thee; and if he lets thee go on and still prosper in a course of sin, this is the fruit of reprobation: and certainly there can scarcely be a greater note of reprobation than prosperity in sin. This is what we should all pray to God to deliver us from; Lord, let us never prosper in sin; if thou seest our way to be naught, that we thereby contract guilt upon our spirits, Lord, let us not thrive and prosper; if we do, a thousand to one but we are undone for ever.

"And Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance."

Ephraim thus put off all that the prophet spake. So when Christ was preaching to the Pharisees, the text saith, Those that were rich derided him. Rich, covetous men slight any thing that is said against them, for they have wherewithal, they think, to relieve their consciences against all their guilt. Well, though thou mayst think to relieve thy conscience for the present, it will not always be so; there is a time that conscience will speak, and will not be put off with those idle conceits.

Obs. 8. The saints believe the word against sense, and carnal hearts believe sense against the word. Herein lies the difference between a godly man and a wicked; I say, one that is godly and has faith, believes the word against sense; Let me go on in a way which I know is God's way, though I do not prosper, yet I have peace in it, I do not repent me of it: but a wicked man will believe sense against the word; Let the word say my way is never so dangerous, yet if by sense I find that I prosper in it, that shall suffice me. "Yet I am become rich, I have found me out substance."

"In all my labours." That is, in all that I get by my labours.

"They shall find none iniquity in me that were sin." That is, let them search, they shall not find in me that which is sin. As if they should say, No, I abhor what you say; to oppress, cheat, and cozen, who can prove it? let any prove if they can that I cheat, or get any thing in a false way; I dare any to come and say it; is there any law that can take hold of me? "They shall find no iniquity in me;" though there are some little matter, yet there is nothing for which the law of the land can take hold of me; and if my way be such as no man can take advantage against me by the law, why should I be thus condemned? That is the meaning of these words. Hence,

Obs. 9. Evil things often have good names. "In all my labours." The truth is, that which is meant here, is that which they had got by oppression and deceit, and they call it by the name of their labours. So covetousness is called by the name of good husbandry, and following their callings, and the art and mystery of their callings. Many think to silence their consciences by such shuffling of names.

Obs. 10. It is very hard to convince covetous men of their iniquity. Rich, covetous men are much conceited in themselves, "The rich man is wise in his own conceit," Prov. xxviii. 11. You shall sometimes see a man that gets riches; and as we say of some when we look upon their wit, we wonder at their wealth; and others when we look upon their wealth, we wonder at their wit to get an estate: they have wit only to get money, but for any thing else they are ignorant, poor, weak men, especially in matters of religion; as weak as children are they, and yet wise in their own conceits, for they have got that which they see all the world runs after. It is very hard to convince covetous men of their falseness, that they get any thing in a sinful way.

Again, There is no sin more hard to convince a man of than covetousness; and yet the apostle saith, 1 Cor. v. 11, that it is a sin for which a man is to be cast out of the church. When almost did you ever hear of a covetous man convinced? what example can you almost ever bring of one that has been covetous and rich, and got his estate in a false way, that shall come and give glory to God, and acknowledge his sin, and cast up his sweet morsels again? Covetousness is a besetting, a blinding sin: Who shall find any iniquity in me? what do I but that which I may do?

Obs. 11. As it is hard to convince, so it is difficult to charge, covetous men with their sin. For so according to some it is, Who dares charge me? It is a very dangerous thing to charge a rich man of any evil, for he has his purse by his side, and can tell how to revenge himself on you.

Obs. 12. Men may in words profess what they themselves are guilty of to be an abominable thing, "They shall find none iniquity in me that were sin." If I should be false, that were a very horrible and vile thing. Go to all tradesmen one after another, and tell them of cheating, and cozening, and deceiving; they will scorn your words. It were a wicked thing, one were unworthy to live. How often, when tradesmen have a mind to cheat, will they profess, that if they should cozen and cheat, they were unworthy to trade any more! Oh what cauterized consciences have many men, that give up themselves to gain, and make Mammon their god! Luther renders it, God forbid that I should be found wicked in my actions. Many deep in guilt will clap their hands on their breasts, and when you charge them with having cheated and cozened you, Oh, God forbid that I should do so! they exclaim; and although their consciences will tell them that they have done so, they will be ready to take their oaths, and swear, and use such curses that they never did such a thing, or never had such a thing; and when their hooks are false, they will swear that they are true.

Abiit ut deprehendar sceleratus in meis factis. Luth. in loc.

Obs. 13. Wicked men care not, so others cannot accuse them. If they can carry it so closely that men shall not see it, then they bless themselves; all is well and fair, if they have cunningly contrived their wickedness, that men cannot charge them with it. Who shall find iniquity in me that were sin? Well, though you think yourselves well enough because men cannot find out your sin, yet God can find it out, "be sure your sin will find you out;" God has his time to find out iniquity that will be sin to you, and there is much between God and your consciences, though men cannot charge you. Oh, but if so be that God would but discover to the world what he is able to charge you with, how loathsome would many of you appear to your neighbours! how unfit would you be to trade with men! or who would meddle with you? Now certainly your condition is not the better because it is kept so secretly that men cannot charge you; perhaps it would be better if they could, for it might bring you sooner to be humbled for it. You think now, because you have only to deal with God, you can do well enough with him. Do you think it such a matter to deal with the infinite, holy, and glorious God? Servants would be troubled if their masters knew their deceit and cozening; but if a little child knew it they care not for that; so men think it is no matter if God know it, but they are loth that men should know it, that will bring shame and disgrace to them. O carnal, wicked, atheistical heart, that cannot be satisfied if men know the evil, but can rest content though God is conscious to it!

Obs. 14. A carnal heart extenuates its guilt. Indeed the words may be interpreted, Who shall find iniquity in me? if they could find it, I would acknowledge it to be a great sin. But I rather take it thus, Who shall find any great iniquity in me? It is but a little overreaching, a little craft and cunning, the matter is not great. Well, that which thou dost account little, the Lord will one day account great; the overreaching and defrauding thy brother, though it be but a slight of hand, God will find one day to be a great matter.

Obs. 15. A soul which God is humbling for good, rather aggravates his sin. That is the way of a true convert, he labours rather to aggravate his sin, to bring all the circumstances he can to make his sin heavy upon his soul. Oh! I find I cannot get my heart to break for my sin, I cannot apprehend the evil of my sin as I would in the greatness of it, and therefore, oh that God would help me to see its magnitude! He studies all the attendant circumstances to make his sin great in his own eyes. But now, a heart that is not wrought upon to a work of repentance, all that he labours for is to lessen his sin, and to have all the reasonings that he can in a way of diminution of his sin. Oh, this is an ill sign!

It is a very ill sign, first, when a man resists conviction as long as he can. Secondly, when, after he can stand out no longer, then he begins to extenuate his guilt: It is no more than others do; and how should I maintain my family? and I hope men may make the best of what they have. Oh! if the Lord once show thee the evil of sin, all these reasonings will vanish before thee, and thou wilt fall down and humble thyself before God, as one worthy for ever to be cast out from the presence of the Lord; for in this, that thou darest not trust in him, thou seekest to hell to provide for thyself and family, rather than thou wilt depend upon God.

Obs. 16. If wicked men can but escape the danger of law, that is all they care for. "They shall find none iniquity in me that were sin;" that is, by the law. Oh how many are there whom you may easily convince of having been very false! You speak to their consciences. Yea, but what is that? can you take your advantage? Take your advantage if you can, say they. Now if it were not for atheism in men's hearts, it would be the greatest advantage of all, that a man is able to charge his conscience. What witness have you for such a thing? I have your conscience. Oh, they are glad of that: if they hear that you have no other witness, they think they can do well enough. Now that is an argument of atheism in men's hearts, that they think they are well enough, whatsoever they do, when law cannot take hold on them. Well, there is a court of conscience to sue thee in, and justice will sue thee in that court, and cast thee one day, though man's law cannot.

Ver. 9. And I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles, as in the days of the solemn feasts.

The connexion is this: You say you are grown rich by those sinful ways of yours; "I am become rich, I have found me out substance." You think now you have no need of me, you have found substance other ways, and I am forgotten by you; but you should remember that "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt:" there was a time when you had need of me, a time when you knew not what to do without my help, and were in great affliction; then I delivered you with a mighty hand; you should remember those old mercies of mine. Oh, but you are ungrateful, you do not think what I have done for you in bringing you out of the land of Egypt. If I be the same God still, why might not you live upon me, and receive as much good from me, as others? You will go and seek to shift for yourselves by false ways, and forsake me. Am not I the Lord? that "God which brought you out of the land of Egypt?" have not I, by what I have done for you, shown plainly to you that you might as well provide for yourselves by me as by any other god, by my ways as well as by any other ways that you take? Can any god work for you so as I have done? Is there that good to be got in those ways of sin which there is in mine? "I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt;" not only at that time delivering you, but ever since providing for you, and graciously preserving you, and doing you good many ways, from the time that I have been a God to you; and yet you do thus wretchedly forsake me. In all your straits I have helped you, in all your necessities I have supplied you, in all your difficulties I have relieved you, in all your distresses I have delivered you, in all your burdens I have eased you; the whole course of my providence has been gracious to you; from the very time of your coming out of the land of Egypt, how did I provide for you in the wilderness, afterwards by judges, and then I raised you up kings!

Obs. 1. When men prosper in sin, they forget what God has done for them in former times. As if he should say, You do not remember that I am "the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt." Now you are "waxen fat" and have your hearts' desires; but remember there was a time when you were low enough, and cried and made your moan to me in your affliction; remember those days. Oh how ordinary is it for us in our prosperity to forget God's mercies in delivering us from affliction! Not long since we were low enough, but the Lord has in great measure delivered us from our Egypt, and presently, as soon as God has delivered us, every man begins to think of enriching himself and to intrigue for estates; presently (I say) we have forgotten our sad condition, the time of our mourning, of our praying. Oh how contrary is the disposition of our hearts now to what it seemed to be a little while ago, when under sore and sad afflictions!

Obs. 2. God takes notice of men's unthankfulness. God looks upon a people that walk so vilely: What! are these the people that I have done such things for? What God has done for us is (to speak after the manner of men) fresh in his memory.

And if we could have what God has done for us afresh in our minds upon the commission of new sins, it would be a mighty means to humble us.

Obs. 3. Old mercies are great engagements to duty, and great aggravations of our neglect of it. But we have had occasion to speak of these things before.

"Will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles, as in the days of the solemn feasts."

Some read it by way of interrogation, thus, What! shall I, the Lord that brought thee out of the land of Egypt, yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles? Shall I yet continue my wonted love to you as to make you to keep your feast of tabernacles still with joy, as you were wont to do yearly? shall I do thus? saith God.

Calvin gives a peculiar interpretation, different from all; as if God should say thus, It is a wonderful thing that you should be so forgetful of my great mercy in bringing you out of Egypt, it is so out of your minds that I had need work over that deliverance again: what! shall I cast you out of your houses, and bring you into captivity again, and then deliver you, and bring you into the wilderness to dwell in tabernacles again? shall I again go over my work? It is so much gone out of your minds and hearts, that such a repetition seems needful to quicken your spirits. Thus Calvin interprets this passage, and he is generally as just as any. This interpretation may be well applied to us, thus:

Let us consider ourselves, that if all God's merciful dealings towards us were to begin again, if we were to go through all those straits, and fears, and sorrows that we have passed through, our hearts would shake within us: as a mariner that has passed through dangerous seas, thinks, If I were to pass over these again, it would be hard and grievous. Now let us consider, if God should but reduce us to the same condition that we were in seven years ago, and say, You shall pass through all those straits, and return into the condition you have been in; it would be very sad to us to think of, the bare apprehension would make our hearts quake. I verily believe scarce any of you who have been at all observant of the providence of God towards you, but would be very loth to venture all again, would be loth that God should go over with you in all those providences. And yet God is the same God still, and may do it; yea, but flesh and blood would shake at it. Now do not show yourselves so unworthy of God's gracious dealings with you, as to put him to it to bring you into straits again, to renew what he has done unto you. Thus we apply Calvin's interpretation.

Many regard the words as a mere threat, and no otherwise: I did indeed bring you from the land of Egypt, but I will bring you into tabernacles again. As if God should say, I will cast you out of your brave, stately palaces, your city and country houses, and you shall come into the wilderness again, and dwell in tents and tabernacles. Thus the many interpret it.

But I rather think the words contain a consolatory promise, whereby the Holy Ghost invites them to repentance; as if God should say thus, Though you have indeed deserved to be cast out of your dwellings, and to be brought into tents and tabernacles in the wilderness again, yet I remember my ancient goodness towards you, and my covenant with your father Abraham; I am the same God that brought you out of the land of Egypt, therefore return and repent, and I will be with you in as much mercy as ever I was; whatever the breaches have been for time past, I will now be as gracious to you as I have ever been; as you have celebrated the feast of tabernacles with abundance of rejoicing, so I will continue this your prosperous estate, you shall from year to year have cause to rejoice in this your solemn feast. All their feasts were feasts of rejoicing; "They have made a noise in the house of the Lord, as in the day of a solemn feast," Lam. ii. 7; but now this feast of tabernacles was especially a feast of rejoicing, and that you have in Lev. xxiii. 40, where they are commanded to rejoice in this feast, for it was after the ingathering of their corn and wine. In Deut. xvi., where this feast is further spoken of, it is said at the end of ver. 15, "Thou shalt surely rejoice;" it is not only you may, but a command, look to it that you do rejoice in this feast of tabernacles; so that the feast of tabernacles was a very joyful feast. Now saith God, "I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt," I will yet make thee rejoice, as in the feast of tabernacles. From hence we have these notes:

Obs. 4. God loves to give hopes of mercy to sinners upon their repentance. God loves to draw the hearts of wretched, vile sinners, by giving them hopes of mercy upon their repentance. So in 1 Sam. xii. 19, 20, they confessed their sin, their special sin, in asking a king, above all; but saith Samuel, Though "ye have done all this wickedness, yet turn not aside from following the Lord." So Ezra x. 2, "Yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing." God sees that if there be not hope, men will grow desperate in their wickedness. "There is no hope: no, for I have loved strangers, and after them will I go," Jer. ii. 25. Oh! it is good for sinners to see there may be still hope.

And God's ministers, when they have to deal with sinners, though very wicked, yet should give them some line of hope to catch at; though they be even drowned in their covetousness in the world, and in their guiltiness, yet should we cast to them a line of hope; there is nothing revealed to exclude the possibility of thy soul yet at length being saved. Oh let men take heed of despairing, determining conclusions against themselves.

Obs. 5. It is not the greatness of any sin that can be ground enough for a desperate determining conclusion. To any who say, God will never show mercy: I reply, No magnitude of sin, no accumulation of aggravated circumstances, can be ground enough for thee to say, God will never show mercy; it is a proud, sullen, desperate spirit of thine to make such conclusions: thou mayst indeed, and thou oughtest to say, It were just with God not to show mercy, the Lord might justly cast me out of his sight; but to say that he will not show mercy, is more than thou, or any angel in heaven, can say; and therefore, O wretched, sinful, guilty consciences, and especially you that have been apostates, that have forsaken God and his truths, yet return. Return. O return, thou Shulamite, thou mayst possibly find God as merciful to thee as ever he was; there is hope of mercy for thee still, and if thou dost perish eternally, it will rather be for some future, than for any past, transgression; if God let thee live, if he let thee live to-night, I say, thou wilt rather perish for the sins committed this moment, than for all the sins committed in all thy life-time before.

But now thy continuance in impenitency is a new sin; thy continuing to reject the grace of God, and abiding still in thy unbelief, this indeed may cause God to bring over again all thy former sins, and reckon for them. Oh! this consideration might draw the heart of the most wretchedly wicked sinner to God.

Is it so, that it is not for any of my past sins that I am like to perish, but if I perish I shall perish rather for continuing in evil, than for what evil I have committed? Oh! the Lord forbid then that I should continue, let me this day stop. The Lord would have hopes of mercy cast to the vilest and most wicked.

And let us be merciful, as our heavenly Father is merciful; that is, let servants and children, that have offended you, see that upon their returning they shall find as much favour from you as ever they did. Sometimes governors, when provoked, behave themselves so rigidly towards their inferiors, that it makes them even desperate: God deals not so with you; be ye then merciful, for God is merciful.

And as God shows himself unchangeable towards his people in goodness, so it becoms us to be. If we have shown respect any way to other, either in speeches or otherwise, if they appear to be what they were, it becoms us to be towards them as then; let them but appear to be what they were when such respect were shown to them, and, according to the example of God, it becoms us to show ourselves to them again and again, to what we then did. "I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles."

Obs. 6. The consideration of what God has done, should help our faith in believing what he will do. May not he who has delivered us thus far, deliver us yet further? I am the Lord that has delivered you from Egypt. O, let us make use of what God has done for us, to help our faith to confide in him for further grace. The truth is, God has done so much for England, that not more remains to be done than has been done; and if there be but as much of the power, goodness, and mercy of God manifested towards us for the next five or six years, as for these last six, certainly it will be as glorious a nation as ever was upon the face of the earth: it will be the beginning of the new Jerusalem, if God should continue so as he has done. And why may not the Lord, that has brought us out of Egypt, bring us to rejoice as in the feast of tabernacles?

And so spiritually; God, who at first did enlighten thy mind, and brought thee from Egyptian darkness, is certainly able to do as great things for thee still, and to finish the work he has begun for thee. How many are there who, though they have found God's mighty hand upon them in giving a turn to their hearts, and bringing them out of "the gall of bitterness" and "the bond of iniquity," yet, when they feel but their corruptions a little stirring, are ready to think that they shall perish one day by the hand of those same corruptions? When we were enemies, were we not reconciled to him? God has given the deadly wound to thy sin, he has mortified thee, and the truth is, there is not more to be done to bring thee to heaven who hast the least degree of grace than God has already done; by giving thee the least measure of grace, he has made a greater alteration in thy estate from one that is in an estate of nature, than the alteration will be from thy conversion to the height of glory; that alteration will not be so much, neither will it require such a great power of God to make thee a glorious saint in heaven, as it required to make thee of a child of wrath, a child of God: thou hast the better half, the most eminent power of God is put forth already; for our change from grace to glory will be but gradual, but our change from nature to grace is total; and therefore, let thy faith be helped from what God has done, to believe what he will do.

"I will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles."

Albertus and others regard this, "I will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles," as a promise of their return from captivity, that they must again, in the land of Jewry, keep the feast of tabernacles.

I confess, were this a promise to Judah, I should think this to be the meaning of it; but because it is to Israel, who never returned, I shall follow those who think it refers to the times of the gospel, and to all the true Israel of God that should be converted to the faith; and I think it has reference to that, because we find so often, in this prophecy of Hosea, things apparently far off applied to the times of the gospel.

"I will yet make thee to dwell in tabernacles." In the spiritual sense thus, The Lord has his time, though he seemed to cast off these ten tribes, yet to bring the Jews, and all the Israel of God, into his church, and to build for them in it several tabernacles. And there in several churches, as in so many several tabernacles, they shall have the feast of sweet things, of "fat things," of "wine on the lees well refined," Isa. xxv. There shall they keep a feast, and there shall their hearts rejoice, and be "satisfied as with marrow and fatness."

My brethren, the Lord has delivered us in great measure from Egypt: all the difficulty now is about the building of tabernacles; for the present there is very little matter to make tabernacles of amongst us. I remember Mr. Ainsworth, on Exod. xxv. 2, citing R. Menahen, tells of a tradition of the Jews, which observed there was no iron stuff for the building of the tabernacle. (Truly our hearts are mostly iron, and hard one towards another, and therefore not fit matter for tabernacles.) In 1 Kings vi. 7. there was no iron tool, either, heard in the building of the temple. O my brethren, iron tools will not do the work for the building of God's tabernacle, we must have tools of another kind. There are no tabernacles almost yet, wherein the saints, either of one judgment or of another, have much rejoicing; the glory of God has not yet filled the tabernacles which we have built. What God intends towards this generation, whether ever to bring them into those tabernacles that he here promises, I know not; but surely that God which has brought us out of Egypt, will bring either us, or the posterity after us, a generation of his own people, to keep the feast of tabernacles, with rejoicing.

Ver. 10, I have also spoken by the prophets, and I have multiplied visions, and used similitudes, by the ministry of the prophets.

This is a further declaration of God's goodness to this people, and an upbraiding of them for their wickedness, when they have had so many means; as if God should say, They have not wanted the revelation of my will, I have spoken by my prophets, and multiplied visions. Heb. i. 1, seems to have reference to this, "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets;" πολυτρόπως και πολυτρόπως, in several sorts of ways God revealed himself in former times.

"I have also spoken by the prophets, and I have multiplied visions."

There is not much difficulty in the words. The notes briefly are these:

Obs. 1. It is God that speaks by his prophets. Though the prophets and the messengers of God are mean, yet so long as they speak to you in his name, the authority of what they say is above any. They may be under their auditors many ways, but the message they bring is above them; though they are weak, yet the power of God goes along with what they speak, to make it good; and therefore you shall find when Christ sent his disciples to preach, saying, "Go and teach all nations," he first said, "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth," and then followed, "Go ye therefore and teach all nations;" as if he should say, All the power that is given to me shall go along with your teaching. It is the Lord that speaks, the Lord Christ that speaks in his word by his messengers; "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me."

The word does little good till men come to apprehend this, that it is God that speaks by his messengers. 1 Thess. ii. 13, the apostle saith, that they received the word, "not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God." That is observable of Samuel; God called to Samuel, and Samuel thought it had been Eli that spake, and all that time God would not reveal his mind to him, till at length Samuel returned this answer, "Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth," 1 Sam. iii. 9. Mark, God would reveal his mind to Samuel then, and not before. So it is here; you come to the word, and you come to hear the gifts of such men, such a man has excellent gifts, and abilities, and delivery, and such kind of things; God reveals nothing to you, you have heard a sound, and that is all, and no more is revealed to you than if you heard an oration in a school: but when God shall be pleased to dart this thought into your minds, I am now going to hear that which is the word of God himself, the word of that God that is my judge, and that must be my judge at the great day; now see whether God will not make himself known to you, that so you shall say, Methinks I never heard sermon before in all my life; I have come and heard a man preach, but I never heard God preach before; it was not as the word of God, but as the word of such a man. God expects that men should "tremble at his word," and therefore look upon it as his word.

Obs. 2. It is a great mercy to a people for God to reveal his mind to them by his prophets. What would all the world be but as a dungeon of darkness, were it not for the prophets and ministers of God? they are as "the light of the world," and "the salt of the earth," Matt. v. 13, 14, the world would rot and be unsavoury were it not for the ministry of the word in the world. And so we find, that when God would make a special promise to his people, he promises them, that they shall have their teachers; "And though the Lord give you the bread of adversity, and the water of affliction, yet shall not thy teachers be removed into a corner any more, but thine eyes shall see thy teachers," Isa. xxx. 20. Oh! here is a promise to a gracious heart. But to another it is nothing. What! shall the ministry of the word counterveil the loss of my estate? God does not say, I will take away from you your afflictions; oh no, but "thine eyes shall see thy teachers;" perhaps your eyes shall never see your money and estates again, but your eyes shall see your teachers. Kings on their coronation days are wont to give great gifts to show their magnificence; then the conduits will sometimes run wine: now, when Christ ascended up to be crowned on high, what were the great gifts that he gave to the world? "He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers," Eph. iv. 8, 10. These are the great gifts of Jesus Christ upon his ascension into heaven and taking the crown of glory; as if Christ should say, Shall I give a magnificent gift to the world like a prince, like the King of heaven? I will give gifts unto men, I will give them apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers: that is the great, magnificent gift that Jesus Christ has given to the world, oh that we could learn to prize it! I remember I have read, in Chrysostom's time, that the godly men, when he was silenced, were so affected with it, that they had rather the sun did withdraw his beams and not shine in the world, than that the mouth of Chrysostom should be stopped; they so prized the word of God by his mouth. Oh! that men could learn to prize it more, at a higher rate! And you that are citizens, show you esteem it highly in this one thing: many of you here have your city and your country houses, but what little care have we to seat ourselves in places where we shall have faithful ministers of God to reveal the mind of God to us! If you come to seat yourselves any where, you scarce take it into consideration to give a penny the more because of a faithful minister, or a penny the less if it has none; oh! this shows the extreme neglect of God, and of his ordinances. How few country villages about the city are supplied with faithful preachers! Faithful prophets are a great blessing of God.

Obs. 3. God will take account of what becomes of the word, labour, and pains of his prophets. So he here upbraids Ephraim with them. God will take account of all the spirits that his ministers spend, of every drop of their sweat, and of all their watchings in the night; I sent my prophets, rising early, and going to bed late; God will take account of all, and you shall know that there has been a prophet among you; the ministers shall be brought out to say and testify, Lord, I was in such a place, and I revealed thy mind thus unto them; they could not but be convinced, and yet still they continued in their wickedness.

Obs. 4. It is a great mercy for God to declare his mind again and again. "I have multiplied visions," saith God. It were a mercy for God but once to tell us of his mind, and if we will not come in at first, for ever to cast us off; but "I have multiplied visions." In Jer. xviii. 7, God saith, "At what instant I shall speak," &c.; and God may justly expect, that "at what instant" Christ is preached, that people should come in, for indeed their commission seems to run very quick; "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," Mark xvi. 15, 16; as if Christ should say, There shall be quick work made with men. But yet the Lord is gracious to men, to multiply visions one after another, to reveal his mind at sundry times and in divers manners: the Lord is long-suffering; though our hearts be not moved at one time, yet still he would try, and he would have his ministers do so too. "In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth," 2 Tim. ii. 25. It was a great aggravation of Solomon's sin, that he departed from God after the Lord had appeared to him twice: "And the Lord was angry with Solomon, because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel, which had appeared unto him twice," 1 Kings xi. 9.

Oh how may God upbraid us with this, that not twice, but twenty, yea, a hundred times he has appeared to us! May not your consciences tell you, that at such and such a time you have had the visions of the Almighty, and yet you have stood out against them, yea, against them again and again? O my brethren, the multiplying of visions greatly aggravates the sin of our resistance. It was the comfort of Paul at his conversion, that he "was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision," Acts xxvi. 19. Oh how happy were it for you if upon the first vision your hearts would come in! Oh that you could but say, Though it is true, I lived at such a time and place in ignorance and darkness, I knew little of God, yet the first time I came to hear the word, wherein the mysteries of the gospel were revealed, I bless God my heart yielded: so the apostle blesses God for the effect that the word had upon the Thessalonians from the first day, even until that time.

“And used similitudes, by the ministry of the prophets.”

This is a very strange expression, occurring no where else that I know of in the book of God. I will not trouble you with divers readings or interpretations, to me it seems to show the aggravations of men’s sins, that they hearkened not to the word, though it was brought down to the level of their understandings by similitudes.

Obs. 5. The Lord takes account of the manner of men’s preaching, as well as the things they preach. Men may have their sins aggravated, not only for standing out against the word, but against the word so and so delivered. The main necessary truths of God are made known to you all; yea, but some of you have them made known to you in a more sweet and winning way, in a more convincing manner, than others have, and God takes account, not only of the message you hear, but of the manner of its delivery.

Obs. 6. The revealing the word by similitudes is very useful and profitable; for it conduces much to make truth go to a man’s heart before he is aware, and to impress it upon the memory; many remember the simile, and so the truth which it conveyed. It is reported of the Marquis Galeacias, a nobleman of great estates, and near of kin to the pope, that once coming but to hear Peter Martyr preach, by a mere simile that he used, God smote his heart, and made it the means of his conversion. The simile was thus: Peter Martyr in his discourse had occasion to say, Men may think very hardly of God and his people, but this is because they do not know him; as suppose a man a great way off sees a company of excellent dancers, the musicians are playing, and there is exact art in all that they do; at the distance he regards them as a company of mad-men. but (added he) as he draws nearer and nearer to them, and hears the melodious sound, and observes the art that they use, then he is much taken and affected: and so it is with you; you are a great way off, and look from a great distance upon the ways of God, and so you think his people mad; but could you but come to observe what excellency is in them, it would take captive your hearts. God blessed such a similitude as this to that great man’s heart, so that though his wife and children lay imploring at his feet, yet he came to Geneva, and there continued a godly man all his days. But we should take some heed here.

1. Similes should be brought from things known.
2. We must not urge similes too far, we must take heed of a luxuriant, wanton wit.
3. And they must be very natural, plain, and proper, or else man will appear in them rather than God.

Obs. 3. Slight not the word when it comes by a simile. “And used similitudes.” You will say, This is but a simile. But though it be, yet God is speaking to thy heart in it.

Obs. 4. Take heed that you do not rest in the pleasantness of the simile. Many come to the word to have their fancies touched and pleased, more than any thing else: do not play with similes; look rather at what you can see of God in them, than how far they savour of the wit of man.

Ver. 11. Is there iniquity in Gilead? surely they are vanity: they sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal; yea, their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the fields.

What Gilead you have heard before in chap. vi. ver. 8, “Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity.”

It was a city of the priests beyond Jordan, where the priests that were beyond the river lived. Sometimes it is taken for the Mount Gilead, where Jacob and Laban met and made a covenant one with another. Here neither is excluded; but most, I find, refer it to the city of the priests. And what Gilgal was you had opened to you in chap. ix. ver. 15, “All their wickedness is in Gilgal.” Now Gilgal was the place where they were circumcised on this side Jordan, and belonged to Judah. Gilead belonged to Israel, Gilgal to Judah.

“Is there iniquity in Gilead? surely they are vanity: they sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal.”

The latter part of this passage the Septuagint render, ἀρα ψευδῆς ἦσαν ἐν Γαλαὰδ ἀρχοντες θυσιαζόντες, surely the princes sacrificing in Gilead are vanity. And indeed the word שׁוֹרִים translated “bullocks” is much akin to שׁוֹרִים which signifies princes, the difference mainly consisting in a title on the right hand or on the left, and so there might easily be a mistake. But to read it as it is here, “They sacrifice bullocks in Gilgal,” great sacrifices; and they think to put off God with their great sacrifices, sacrificing bullocks, but all in vain.

The places having been spoken of before, we may proceed at once to see what the scope of the Holy Ghost is here. “Is there iniquity in Gilead?”

“Is there?” an interrogation; it is as if he should say, Who dare say there is iniquity in Gilead? Gilead! what! the city of the priests, iniquity there! who will charge Gilead, where the priests are, with iniquity? What! are you wiser than all our priests? Just like to the plea which some heretofore have had, What! do not our ministers do thus? Is not this their opinion? shall we not regard what our ministers do? “Is there iniquity in Gilead?” is there iniquity among them? do they not join in this way? This seems plainly to be the scope of this charge, “Is there iniquity in Gilead?” It is the city of the priests! is there iniquity there? what! in a place where they use to meet, where they dwell?

“Surely they are vanity,” saith the prophet. Even these priests of Gilead, on whom you rest so much, are but vanity; you may give up your consciences and your ways to them, because they come and persuade you that such a thing is to be done, and you must do it, and so by giving up your consciences and ways to them you may be led into much evil.

“Surely they are vanity.” Though they be your priests, though they be learned men, and should understand the way of God, yet they have their own interests too, they drive their own designs; they keep not the truth of God, but they follow their own minds. “Surely they are vanity.” Those ways to which they persuade you, God allows not of, they will prove vanity. Let the learned note, even wise, learned, understanding men, priests who seemed to be much for God, may yet be vanity.

Obs. 1. Whatsoever is presented in the worship of God, if not by God’s appointment, is mere vanity. “Surely they are vanity,” even Gilead.

Again, This Gilead being on the other side of Jordan, was taken by the Assyrians, and its inhabitants were first carried away captive, as appears, if you read 2 Kings xv. 29. Those that were on the other side Jordan were carried captive first, and Gilead among the rest; so that it is probable that this prophecy was delivered after the capture of Gilead by the enemy, before the rest of the tribes were taken: and then the force of his argument is this:

There is iniquity in Gilead; yea, and Gilead has smarted for her iniquity; though they promised themselves peace, yet all proved but vanity: yea, they smarted very dreadfully, for in Amos i. 3 it is said, that Gilead was “threshed with threshing instruments of iron.” Now Amos was contemporary with Hosea, and speaks of the wonderful miseries that had befallen the city of Gilead. As if the prophet should say, Do not you know there is iniquity in Gilead? has not God declared it by his severe wrath upon Gilead? have not they proved vanity? What then can Gilgal expect? They yet sacrifice bullocks, they are guilty of the same sin of false worship as Gilead was. God had appointed but one place to worship in, but they had abundance of sacrifices, and had their altars as common as the very heaps of stones in the fields.

Obs. 3. When God's judgments have been against any for sin, all guilty of the same sins have cause to fear, and not promise safety to themselves though they be spared a while.

But further, and chiefly, Gilead had smarted thus and thus, and the prophet now speaks to Gilgal, which belonged to Judah: Look to yourselves; if Gilead has smarted thus, you are like to suffer as much or even more; for Gilead did not own the temple; the ten tribes (you know) had forsaken the temple, and were further removed from God in their very profession; but Gilgal belonged to Judah, and so nearer to God in outward relation, they professed a greater care of his worship: now, saith he, What! shall God be thus avenged of Gilead for false worship? how then shall Gilgal escape, that profess a greater nearness to God in his worship, and yet for all that corrupt God's worship, and "sacrifice bullocks;" "yea, their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the fields?" Hence,

Obs. 4. Those whose principles and professions are nearer to God than others, if they be superstitious, God will be sorely avenged upon them: those (I say) whose principles and profession come most near in the matters of worship.

We may look at this point as nearly concerning ourselves; thus, if a superstitious, prelatical ministry and people had the wrath of God pursuing them, as it has been heavy upon them, then those who shall profess to come near in the point of reformation, whosoever they be, this side or the other, who profess to come nearest, if they mingle their own inventions in worship, God will be more sorely displeased with them: the more piety and holiness, the more we profess to come close to the word of God, and yet withal mingle our own inventions, the more is God displeased; Gilgal offends more than Gilead.*

"Their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the fields." As husbandmen use to gather their stones that kept the corn from growing, and every furrow almost some of them were laid in a heap; so, saith he, their altars were as common as those heaps of stones.

Or it may have reference to some of their superstitious or idolatrous customs. In the furrows of the fields they had many altars built to sacrifice, that they might seek God for the fructifying of their land; such a kind of worship of God as afterwards the heathens rendered to their dii terminales, for a blessing on their lands; and, following their example, the papists. And heretofore in England you know it was customary in procession-weeks for the men, when they went up and down their perambulation, in the bounds of their fields to set up crosses and crucifixes, and to have prayers read, and psalms sung, which were intended not merely to show the bounds of their parish, but to invoke God for his blessing upon their fruits. By making and setting up crosses in the bounds of their fields, they thought there so came a blessing upon their corn, and therefore, at certain times of the year especially, they would go to their crosses, and offer their prayers there, that they might have their corn and pastures more blessed. Thus we see superstition and idolatry are ever the same, among the Gentiles, among the papists, and lately among ourselves; they all had their altars "as heaps in the furrows of the fields."

Or in a way of threat, as some interpret it, Their altars shall be broken down, and they shall be "as heaps" of stones "in the furrows of the fields:" so in Jer. xxvi. 18, "Zion shall be ploughed like a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps;" as God threatened them, so their altars are here threatened to be broken down, and to be as heaps in the field; God will regard their fine and costly altars no more than rubbish and heaps of stones in the fields.

Ver. 12. And Jacob fled into the country of Syria, and Israel served for a wife, and for a wife he kept sheep.

God by the prophet here again introduces Jacob. He had spoken before of his wrestling with God and prevailing, and yet again the prophet recurs to his history, because he saw that the people of Israel, when charged with their sins, and threatened with the anger of God, still had recourse to Jacob their father, and thought because they were the seed of Jacob, therefore God would not deal so severely with them; therefore still the prophet seeks to lead them off from such a mode of reasoning.

"And Jacob fled into the country of Syria." As if he should say thus, You pride yourselves in your father Jacob; yea, but consider in what a mean condition Jacob was, and if any privilege comes to you as being his seed, it results from the mere free grace of God, and not from any excellency there was in your father Jacob. He would take off the conceit of excellency in their father Jacob, for whose worthiness they thought that God surely would not forsake his posterity, though very wicked: as if he should say, Consider what a poor condition your father Jacob was in:

First, He was a poor exile, fain to flee for his life, even from his father's house. And then when he did flee, he fled to his uncle; and what was he there? a poor servant; he lived in two hard apprenticeships (as it were) with his uncle Laban; he found him to be a very hard master to him for seven years, and for seven years after that he behaved himself roughly and rigidly towards him, oftentimes changing his wages. Saith he, Do not forget the meanness of Jacob: he fled thus; and when in Syria he would marry, he had no dowry; but was fain to serve for a wife, his condition was so low and mean. That is the first reason why the prophet brings in Jacob here again, to take them off from too high a conceit of Jacob their father, that they should not rest themselves in him, nor pride themselves in his excellency.

Secondly, That he might show what their father Jacob was, how unlike to him were his posterity, for he was patient and humble under long and hard afflictions: as if he should say, He was content to serve, and to be in a low and mean condition; but you are proud and haughty, you can bear nothing, you must be high and brave, and must conform yourselves to other nations. Your father Jacob was content to serve a long time for a wife, seven years, and seven years again, and went on in a humble and patient way, and kept close to God all that while: it is not so with you who are his posterity.

Thirdly, He brings in the example of Jacob, to show how wonderful the providence of God was towards him, in carrying him to his uncle's house, and providing there for him; in protecting him against his uncle Laban; in raising his estate, for he went over with his staff in his hand, but the Lord raised him to be two bands: the providence of God was such towards your father Jacob. As if the prophet should say, You speak of your father Jacob, oh that you would but so consider him as to be what he was, to be patient and humble under God's hand, and to wait upon God's providence to work good for you: no, but you will be providing and shifting for yourselves, and you dare not trust to God as your father Jacob did. Thus, in these three respects, you see something of the intention of the prophet in introducing again Jacob.

But this will not suffice for the exposition of this notable scripture; we must refer to the story of Jacob, as narrated Gen. xxviii. and xxix.

This verse refers to both,

I. His flight from the house of his father Isaac to Syria, to Laban, Gen. xxviii.

II. His serving Laban for his wives those twice seven years, Gen. xxix.

I. Jacob's flight into Syria. From this you may derive much instruction. It was ordered for two ends:

1. To save his life. Esau threatened the life of Jacob, and by the counsel of his mother he fled to his uncle Laban's, until the wrath of Esau should be appeased.

2. God purposed good out of his evil; he designed him advantages from his flight. Many times God is pleased to turn the flights of his people to their abundant good: they may flee because of their enemies, and think that if they can but have their lives for a prey they will do well; yea, but God may have a further end, and intend abundance of good to them, even that they shall find more mercy in that place where they flee but to get a shelter for their lives, than ever they had in all their lives before. Many that have fled from persecution of ungodly men, though they have fled from their father's house, and from their own country, yet in their flight have found greater mercies there than ever they did in all their lives before; they can tell great stories of the mercies of God to them in the places of their exile. So it was here with Jacob: one purpose of God in his flight was, that he might provide a wife for himself out of his mother's kindred, for so he was charged by his father, to get a wife of the daughters of Laban, Gen. xxviii. And further observe, as Isaac foresaw that Jacob was like to endure a great deal of trouble and affliction in this his flight, he renews the blessing upon him. And thus God is wont to do when he sees his people in a way wherein they are like to suffer sore and hard afflictions; he prepares them by renewing his blessing upon them, by a fresh manifestation of himself to them. His father's blessing did help much to carry Jacob through all his afflictions, and the renewing of God's blessing suffices to carry the believing soul through many and deep waters.

II. Jacob's serving for his wives those two seven years. When Isaac sent Jacob away, he sent him in a very mean condition, without any such provision as Abraham's servant had when he went to seek a wife for Isaac; in Gen. xxiv. 10, we read Abraham sent with his servant a great deal of provision, and ten camels, and earrings, and bracelets, and the like; but Jacob is sent away to seek for a wife with only a staff in his hand.

If it be said, that the reason why he was sent so meanly was, that he might not be discovered on account of the rage of Esau.

Though that might be a reason of his first going away in so mean a condition, yet that could not be the reason why Isaac should not afterwards send after him; but we never read that Isaac sent any servant after him, but sent him away with his staff in his hand, having only the blessing of God upon him. Therefore it is more probable, that God thereby did mean to train up Jacob in a low condition, in an estate of affliction, to patience, and humility, and dependence upon God.

Well then, he flees to Syria to his uncle Laban; when he comes there he serves him, yea, he was a servant to him for even twenty years together in a low condition, Gen. xxxi. 38; and during all this time he found Laban, though his kinsman, very rough to him; as many times young people, coming to their kindred, find them at first very rough and harsh towards them. Laban was very churlish, yea, even very false, to him, yet Jacob goes on, and endures "in the day the drought," and "the frost by night." Isaac his father was alive at this time, and yet we never read that during it he sent to him, a thing much to be wondered at; we read of no intercourse between them all this while, but Jacob lives apart from his father, though a rich man and a great man, and goes on in a humble, patient, and quiet way, depending upon God to make an issue out of all his sufferings; and God did at length make a very glorious issue out of all, though Laban used him hardly. Now, being Isaac's son and having the blessing, one would have thought that Laban should have been willing to have bestowed a daughter upon him; nay, but he is obliged to serve for a wife, and when he has served, is deceived with a Leah, which was a very great injury to Jacob, but Laban urged her upon him. It is very great cruelty in guardians, or parents, or any that have the government of others, to force wives upon them for their own private advantage; those matches seldom come to good; though God turned this to good, yet I say these forced matches seldom come to good, they are the undoing of many. Jacob desired to have the wife that he had served for. Nay, saith Laban, Gen. xxix. 27, "Fulfil her week," the week of the festivity of her marriage, that is, confirm the marriage with Leah first; for Laban knew that except he had willingly afterwards gone in to her, he had not been bound to her as a husband: Laban would have him own her for his wife, and then, said he, we will agree together, you shall serve seven years more for Rachel, and you shall have her also. But now we must not understand this as if Laban kept Rachel from Jacob till he had served "yet seven other years," that is, completed fourteen years; no, he did but fulfil the week of Leah, and then Laban gave Rachel to him, yet upon condition that he should afterwards serve seven years for her also: this is plainly what was required of him. And as an evident demonstration that Rachel was given to Jacob before her seven years were completed, it appears from the story that Leah had no children until Rachel was married to Jacob, and yet all the twelve patriarchs were born to him within the compass of the twenty years that he was with Laban. Now if the first had not been born till after the fourteen years' service, it could not possibly be, that all of the rest should be born within the six remaining years; for we find in the story that Leah had four children one after another, and then left off bearing, and then she gave Zilpah to Jacob, who bare two sons, and after that Leah had another son and a daughter, and all this before Rachel had any children: so that it must needs be understood that Rachel was given to Jacob at the end of the first seven years, yet that he served two seven years for these two wives.

Now the Lord was pleased to turn this to a great deal of good, though it was hard service and bondage; these two wives that Jacob served so long for, were made the two greatest instruments of good that ever have been in the church before or since, excepting only the virgin that brought forth Christ: for by these two was the house of Israel built up, twelve tribes came of them and of those that they gave to Jacob, but the Holy Ghost reckons the building up by these two; and from them the blessing that was wont to be upon a married condition was proverbially taken; in Ruth iv. 11, the elders said to Boaz, "The Lord make the woman that is come into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel;" this was the common blessing on a married condition,

The Lord make this woman like Rachel and like Leah, that built the house of Israel.

Why like these two, rather than Sarah?

Because they built up the house of Israel, and all that came from them were of the church. Oh it is a great blessing in a married condition to build up the house of God. Though thou shouldst serve hardly for a wife, yet if God makes thy marriage so blessed to thee, as to enable thee thereby to build up the church of God, that is a blessed marriage: those that are married, and their friends, in their prayers, should pray to God for such a blessing; Oh that the Lord would make this woman to be a builder up of the house of Israel!

But from the prophet's introducing here the flight and servitude of Jacob, we may

Obs. 1. Such as pride themselves in their ancestors, should look back to their mean condition. Some are very high in their conceits because they have such and such ancestors; it may be two or three degrees off they were great, but look but a little further, and they were but mean tradesmen, or yeomen in the country: here the prophet would take these off from priding in their ancestors. It is a great vanity for any to pride themselves in their ancestors. Plato said, all kings came from ploughmen, and all ploughmen from kings. Because some are great and rich by some providence or other, they think themselves above the common sort of mankind, they look upon others with contempt: "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn," saith the prophet, Isa. li. 1, "and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged."

Obs. 2. Patience, and humility, and dependance upon God in times of long-continued afflictions, much commend the grace of God in any. I say, when any shall be patient, and humble, and depend upon God in times of long affliction, this much commends the grace of God in them.

O let me urge this, I. Upon any of you that are in hard services. If I were to speak to a congregation of apprentices, that had hard services, and rough masters, and cruel mistresses, I would charge them not to fret and vex, not desperately to fling off and say, Why should I bear such services? Do not in a desperate mood determine to go and seek your fortunes, as they are wont to say. Many young men have undone themselves through the roughness of their masters and mistresses to them in their apprenticeships, and though the evil will be upon themselves, yet God will require this at their masters' and mistresses' hand. This is a sign that there is no fear of God, that because they are in hard services, therefore they should resort to desperate courses. It may be your brother or sister has an excellent service, more liberty, better wages, and better provision, than you have; yet, seeing God in his providence has disposed of you to such a hard service, look up to God, and wait upon him continually to work good through it; God may intend good to you in such a service more than you are aware of.

2. As for any of you that are come out of hard services, look back to them, and consider how you behaved yourselves in them. Are you the seed of Jacob? If you be, though your service has been hard, yet have you gone on patiently, and humbly, and in dependance upon God, as Jacob did; and God will remember this for good to you afterwards. Yea, but now, did not you behave yourselves proudly and stubbornly, and so make your service so much the more hard, by provoking your governors? O, look back to these things, and consider how far you are from being of the disposition of Jacob, that you profess to be your father. Many apprentices in their hard services have done that which they have cause to repent of afterwards.

Obs. 3. Love will carry through long service. "Israel served for a wife." Love is ashamed to complain of difficulties. Oh, so it would be if we loved God; we would not then complain of his service as difficult.

Obs. 4. A good wife is a great blessing of God, though she has no portion. Though a man serve for her, yet is she a great blessing from God; there is a more special mercy of God there, than there is in giving men an estate. He served long, and long, even for a wife.

Luther, on the place, speaks much about the blessing in marriage of a good wife. Certainly, saith he, Jacob did not serve so long that he might have a companion of his life with whom there should be nothing but railing, scolding, and wrangling; no, but he looked upon marriage as the school of all virtue, for so should a married estate indeed be.

Obs. 5. Children should not marry without or against their parents' consent. If you profess yourselves to be of the seed of Jacob, (for so the godly are called in Scripture,) be like to your father Jacob in this, in being obedient to your parents in your matches. Jacob had a charge from his father to take a wife in Laban's family, and therefore he would rather serve seven years, and seven years afterwards, than seek a wife any where else. There is no greater disobedience in the world, than that of children, in the case of marriage, flinging off the yoke of subjection to their parents. Luther urges this point exceeding much. Civil laws require the consent of parents in all lawful marriages; and so the authority of sacred Scripture declares to us, that those marriages have been ever bappy that have been with the consent of their parents. And again, (saith he,) experience testifies that those marriages have been for the most part unhappy, that have been without the consent of parents; certainly the blessing of God is not upon them; you may think to please yourselves in the gratification of your lusts for a week or two, but it is just with God that you should live miserably all your days who make no more conscience of disobedience to your parents in your matches. And if any of you here present be guilty in this respect, know that the Lord rebukes you this day, commands you to go alone and humble yourselves, and to bewail that sin of yours, which is certainly very great: you had need, both husband and wife together, to fast and pray to God to remove the guilt of that sin, that so you may have a blessing upon your married estate, and upon your posterity.

Ver. 13. And by a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved.

Still the prophet goes on to show their meanness in their ancestors. Your father Jacob was thus a poor exile, and fain to serve for his wife. It is true, Joseph was a while in prosperity; but when Joseph was dead, all your ancestors then were in Egypt as miserable bond-slaves; they were there as bond-slaves, and how should they get out? there was no apparent way, Pharaoh, a mighty king, opposed to them, they without friends or armies to help them. God indeed sent them a prophet, Moses; and what was he? one that had been a poor shepherd for forty years together in the wilderness: and when this prophet was to go into Egypt to deliver them, was it likely that he should ever succeed? He went into Egypt in a mean and low condition; "He took his wife and his sons, and set them upon an ass, and he returned to the land of Egypt," Exod. iv. 20; and when he came there the children of Israel would not own him, and Pharaoh would not let Israel go: how should this one Moses deliver them? nay, their bondage increased when Moses came to them. Yet "by a prophet" (the text saith) "the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved." This was a mighty work of God, to bring Israel out of Egypt by a prophet, and to preserve them in the wilderness. And by the way, you read in Exod. xxxviii. 26, there were numbered of males "from twenty years old and upward, six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty;" and in Numb. i. 46, in the second year after they went out from Egypt, you find that there was just the same number, besides Levi, whom God had taken for himself to be his portion: thereby God would show that none should lose any thing that they did for him. How often, when men have been willing to give any thing to God, has God made it up in one year!

Non tam longo tempore servit Jacob ut haberet sociam vitæ, cum quâ perpetuo raxaretur, tanquam scholam omnium virtutum matrimonium cupide ingressus est. Luth. in loc.

But to return, I introduce this to show the great work of God, that by a prophet he brings such a number out of Egypt, and preserves them in the wilderness, using no means for their preservation or guidance but a mean prophet: by him he provides water, and meat, and clothes for them; defends them against their enemies, that they should not come and destroy them; when they were in any danger, helps them; when stung by the serpents, shows them what they should do to be healed; and by him, a mean prophet, composes all their differences. Such was the mighty work of God towards them.

He does not say, "the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt," but "by a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved." This was to show,

First, Their very low and mean condition, that they had no succour nor help in the sight of human reason; human reason could no way help them, they had none but a poor prophet.

Secondly, That God in their deliverance would appear himself, and would work such a glorious work by his own hand.

Thirdly, To upbraid this people to whom Hosea then preached, for the abuse of his prophets. There was a time (saith he) a prophet stood you in stead: now you care not for the prophets, they may speak what they will, but you care not for them; but there was a time that a prophet stood you in stead, however stout and proud you are now. I find divers interpreters observe this, and among the ancients Cyril of Alexandria especially, showing how instrumental a prophet had been for good to them. Had not God blessed the endeavours of a prophet for good to your forefathers, where had you been at this day?

Obs. 1. The consideration of the shiftless estate of our ancestors should humble us much. And if the consideration of our ancestors' estate should humble us thus, how much more when we consider our own! Oh, lately, how shiftless were we! And the truth is, though there were armies raised, yet God would not so much as look at them, but rather looked at his prophets, and his servants; the praying people were the main and principal means that helped us in that condition: and this should humble us; we should take heed of growing haughty and proud when we are delivered, considering how shiftless we were but a little while ago; and therefore, if now we have gotten peace, and prosperity seems to be following in, let us guard against pride; look back to that shiftless, poor condition that you were in a little while ago.

Obs. 2. When God works great things for his church, his way is to work it by very small means. Little means God uses when he intends the greatest mercies to his church. God's deliverance of his people from Egypt, was a type of the deliverance of his churches to the end of the world from their bondage and afflictions. And God sends them a prophet, and he must deliver them: "By a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved." Though God did it, yet God speaks of the prophet as the great instrumental means for their help. God takes delight in this, when he does good to his people, not to make use of such great means, as when he works his own ends towards other people: when God intends good towards other people, he will do it in a more natural way, by natural means; but when he comes to work good for his own, he will do it in a more supernatural way; for mercies are so much the sweeter by how much the more God is in them; the more we see the finger of God in a mercy, the sweeter it is. And above all things, the Lord accounts himself glorified in his people's depending upon him in the want of all means; the Lord accounts this his glory, that he may be an object of the rest of the souls of his people, that when they are in any straits, in any afflictions, yet they can look upon God as an object for their rest, and can say, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul."

O consider this, ye servants of God, when in straits and difficulties; remember, that God accounts it to be that in which he rejoices, as the special glory of his name, that his servants shall make him in their straits the rest of their souls: and this is the reason why he is wont to work so much good for his people by such poor and weak means.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation of men's sins, if they grow naught and wicked after God has in a more than ordinary manner appeared for their good. If then they grow naught and wicked, when God has appeared from heaven for their good, and wrought beyond all natural means, and set them upon their legs again, and delivered them, it much aggravates their sins.

Obs. 4. Unkindness to, and abuse of, such as are related, though but by succession, to those whom God has used to be instruments of our deliverance, is a very great evil. This I think the Holy Ghost especially intends here. By a prophet the Lord brought them out of Egypt, and by a prophet he preserved them; and what! do you now treat unkindly and abuse prophets? Divers good things God had done for his people by prophets, as by Moses here, so afterwards by Samuel, and Elijah, and Elisha; great things in the matters of state God had done for this people by prophets, and therefore he takes it very ill that they should so abuse and slight the prophets.

This shows, 1. A base levity of spirit. 2. An abominable ingratitude of spirit and vile injustice; and God will avenge these things. We have a remarkable illustration in Judg. viii., ix. In the former, ver. 33—35, it is said, "And it came to pass, as soon as Gideon was dead, that the children of Israel turned again, and went a whoring after Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god. And the children of Israel remembered not the Lord their God, who had delivered them out of the hands of all their enemies on every side: neither showed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal, namely, Gideon, according to all the goodness which he had showed unto Israel." Gideon had been such a famous instrument of good to Israel, that they received forty years' prosperity by him; but as soon as he was gone, the people went a whoring from God, and then they were unkind towards his posterity. So in chap. ix. 6, "And all the men of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo, and went, and made Abimelech king." And Jotham one of Gideon's sons, expostulates with them, and tells them the parable of the trees that desired a king; and, in ver. 19, 20, saith, "If ye then have dealt truly and sincerely with Jerubbaal and with his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him also rejoice in you: but if not, let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour the men of Shechem, and the house of Millo: and let fire come out from the men of Shechem, and from the house of Millo, and de-your Abimelech." As if he should have said, God will avenge this. What! did God make my father an instrument of so great good to you, and do you so ill requite all his kindness and service? The Lord judge, and if it be so indeed, as now I charge you, let this be a manifestation of God's displeasure, that "fire come out from Abimelech," &c. As if he should say, Do not think that you can have peace and quiet in your present courses; you think you have provided well for yourselves in setting up Abimelech, and you now bless yourselves therein; We shall have peace, say you: oh no, the displeasure of God will go on and pursue you, and there will be a fire among yourselves; and it is just with God that it should be so, for this ingratitude of yours towards those who have been so instrumental for your good. The Scripture holds out this, that this is one way for God to avenge himself upon a people that shall be ungrateful to such as have been instrumental for good to them, that they shall have a perverse spirit mingled among themselves, that when they think to provide for their own ease and peace, they shall have a fire kindled among them, so as in the conclusion to devour each other. These people, in Judg. viii. 22, were very zealous for Gideon, when God had delivered them by his means; "Then the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son, and thy son's son also;" they made great promises then, they were then mightily affected. We were in a dangerous condition, say they, and were like to have been in perpetual bondage under our enemies, but God has stirred up thee, and blessed thee, and therefore thou, and thy son, and thy son's son shall rule over us. They were mightily affected with this mercy of God when it was fresh, but presently after you shall find they "remembered not the Lord their God, who had delivered them," nor Gideon, the instrument of God's mercy to them; but requited the posterity of Gideon as ill as if he had been one of their greatest enemies.

O my brethren, this is a sore and grievous evil, the Lord cannot endure ingratitude.

Ver. 14. Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly: therefore shall he leave his blood upon him, and his reproach shall his Lord return unto him.

"Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly." It is true, (saith God by the prophet,) that I loved your father Jacob, and I have magnified myself towards his posterity, in the great and wonderful things which I have done for them; but you have been a wretched people, and provoked me most bitterly: as if he should say, Gentleness, sweetness, and love, dwell in God, if he be not provoked; if there be any anger, it is from men's provoking him.

You have provoked me bitterly, in bitterness: you have provoked, you have embittered my Spirit against you, by your bitter sins; you make my Spirit, that is so sweet of itself, to be bitter against you.

The word תְּרִיבִי signifies sometimes to exalt and make high; and accordingly Tremelius, Vatablus, Calvin, and others, translate it, high places, You have provoked me with the high places. Indeed that was a special sin, the sin of idolatry, which provoked God most bitterly against them.

But it is more full to translate it according to the more strict signification of the word, You have provoked me in bitterness, you have been very bitter against my saints that would go from Samaria to worship at Jerusalem. I have shown in this prophet how bitter the ten tribes were against any that would separate from them and go to worship at the temple. You have provoked me in that bitter sin of abusing my prophets, in that ingratitude of yours towards those whom I have made instrumental for your good; you have provoked me in sinning against such great mercies; you have forsaken the living God, the fountain of all good, and have turned yourselves to vanity; you have provoked me to anger most bitterly. From whence,

Obs. 1. God is not angry but when he is provoked. Neither should we be; let us be as our heavenly Father is: saith God, "Ephraim provoked him to anger."

Obs. 2. Sin provokes God, puts God to stir up his anger, puts it to the trial whether there be any anger in God or no. So Heb. iii. 9, "Your fathers proved me," ἰδοκίμασαν, they tested me, they would put it to trial whether there was such anger in me. Wicked men indeed do so; they hear much of the anger of God against sin, and they put it to trial, they will see whether it be so or no; they dare not say so in words, but their actions do so. Oh, it is a dreadful evil to provoke God. 1 Cor. x. 22, "Do we provoke the Lord to jealousy? are we stronger than he?" Can you stand it out with God? Is it not folly to provoke a man that is a superior, that has power over you, and can crush you? O wretched, bold heart, that dares stand it out to provoke the eyes of his glory, to provoke the Holy One of Israel! What, to provoke him that can stamp you into hell presently! to provoke him that has the point of the sword of justice at your hearts! but yet this is the boldness of ungodly men; a man that dares not provoke his landlord, yet will dare to provoke God.

Obs. 3. It is a great evil to provoke one another to wrath, but a greater evil to provoke to wrath God. In Eph. vi. 4, parents are charged not so much as to provoke their children to wrath; and wilt thou then provoke God? If we will provoke one another, let us "provoke unto love and to good works;" to a kind of acrimony of love, Heb. x. 24. So in Gal. v. 26, it is said, "Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, provoking one another;" προκαλούμενοι, calling forth one another's corruptions, that is the meaning of it; Let there not be a desire of vain-glory, provoking one another, calling forth one another's corruptions. Oh! it is an evil thing that we do call forth the corruptions of one another so. Was there ever times like the present? men provoking one another, and stirring up one another to envy, wrath, and malice; O, take heed of this, wonderful mischiefs have resulted from it. What mischief do you think will come then of provoking God to anger? Consider this, especially you that are of passionate spirits; if a wife, a servant, or a child, do any thing amiss, you are presently all on fire; oh that you would reflect, What! shall I, a poor worm, be so soon provoked with a fellow creature if he displease me? O Lord, what a wretch am I then, that dare provoke the infinite God! What, can I think my anger to be so terrible to a child, a neighbour, a servant? oh, how terrible is the anger and wrath of an infinite God against a creature when he is provoked! I cannot bear it, whoever provokes me; why should I think that the infinite God should bear with me when I provoke him? Oh that the passionate would consider! But further:

"Bitterly."

"Most bitterly." Gualter has a very good expression about this; and especially in speaking of idolatry as provoking God: Just as if a wife that had broken her covenant, and used many unlawful dalliances, should attempt in like manner to manifest regard to her own husband, and be aware of her falseness. Oh what a bitter-provocation would this be! a husband would not bear it. Just so did this people do in their idolatries; in idolatry they go a whoring to idols, and will tender up to God himself that kind of worship which they give to their idols: oh this is a bitter provocation.

Obs. 4. Though sin of its own nature does provoke God, yet there are some sins which provoke him more than others. "Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly." So Heb. iii. 8, "Harden not your hearts, as in the provocation," ἐν τῷ παραπικρασμῷ, in the time of bitterness. Oh, some things, as hardness of heart and false worship, imbitter God's Spirit; yea, many times even those things wherein we think we do God a great deal of service imbitter his Holy Spirit. Oh, there are many men who think they serve God in doing that which provokes him bitterly. We know what the Scripture saith, that when they shall deal thus and thus with the saints they shall think that they do God good service: they may have a good intention in what they do, and yet provoke God bitterly. Oh let us not rest in good intentions; I question not but this people pleaded their intentions to the prophet. Well, whatsoever their intentions were, yet by their actions they bitterly provoked God.

And as there are some sins that are as bitter clusters, "their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter," as the Holy Ghost saith, Deut. xxxii. 32; so God will be as bitter against those that provoke him bitterly, "They shall be devoured with bitter destruction," Deut. xxxii. 24. Oh, for the creature to forsake God is "an evil thing and bitter," Jer. ii. 19; and it will be bitterness in the end, as Abner said to Joab, 2 Sam. ii. 26, "Knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end?" Oh, those dalliances of thine will be bitterness in the end; those sins of thine that are the most pleasing to thee, as they are bitter to God, so God will make them bitter to thee one day. "Her end is bitter as wormwood," Prov. v. 4; though the beginning is sweet as "an honeycomb" to you, yet the Holy Ghost saith, that "her end is bitter as wormwood." So Jer. iv. 18, "Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee; this is thy wickedness, because it is bitter." My brethren, we are charged in Scripture to take heed of being bitter one against another; the husband is charged not to be bitter against his wife, Col. iii. 19. It is an evil thing when in a family there is bitterness. Oh, but when the Spirit of the eternal God is bitter against a people! You wives who have such a bondage upon you, who find it evil to have such bitterness from your husbands, oh but then look up to God, is God's Spirit sweet to you? it is a blessing to have the Spirit of God sweet. There is a generation of men that have God's Spirit bitter towards them, by their being bitter one against another. In Eph. iv. 31, it is said, "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice:" this is the charge of God; as we would obey him in any thing, we are charged to put away "all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking." Oh what a spirit of bitterness prevails among us! how bitter are our words and speeches! In Psal. lxiv. 3, wicked men are said to "whet their tongue like a sword, and bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words." If ever bitter words did fly like arrows about our ears, they do at this day; I verily believe that England never understood, as lately, what bitter words meant. In Rev. viii. 11, it is said, "the third part of the waters became wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter." My brethren, sometimes the third part of sermons are wormwood, are bitter: oh, I would to God that we could not sometimes say the same of prayer; bitterness in prayer, in writing, in speaking, in conferring one with another, do you not think that this much provokes God? Yea, even those men that were wont to draw down sweetness on one another's spirits in prayer, what do they now? they cannot meet together but with bitter spirits, one imbittering the other, as if there were nothing but gall and wormwood among us. Let me apply that scripture in James iii. 11, "Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter?" What! those that were of such sweet natures and dispositions, and by grace much more sweet, does there now nothing but bitterness come out of such fountains? one would wonder to see men's natures so changed besides the work of grace. Oh, shall out of the same fountain come forth "sweet water and bitter?"

"Therefore shall he leave his blood upon him." That is, he shall bring his sin upon his own head: Those that will be wilful in sin, their blood be upon their own heads; that is the meaning. Never stand excusing any more; you have warning enough; if you will go on in your way, the blood be upon your own head, you will undo yourselves and there is no help. Mark the phrase, "Therefore shall he leave his blood upon him."

Obs. 5. When God brings the guilt and the punishment of sin on a man's own head, and there leaves it, that is sad indeed. In 2 Sam. xii. 13, it is said, that when Nathan came and rebuked David for his sin, on David's confessing his sin Nathan said to him, "The Lord also hath put away thy sin;" בטלה הניכר הטאתך which is translated by some thus, The Lord hath made thy sin to pass away: oh, that is a happiness indeed, when it may be said of God, he has made the sin and the guilt to pass away from the sinner. But on the other side, when God leaves the sin, with its attendant guilt, upon the sinner, as if God should say, Here is the guilt of sin upon the head of such a man, and let it abide and lie, I shall leave his blood upon him; as in Ezek. xxii. 20, the Lord saith, "So will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there." The Lord many times brings his saints into the fire of afflictions, but he will not leave them there; but when he brings the wicked into the fire, there he leaves them.

"And his reproach shall his Lord return unto him." That is, they do what lies in them to bring a reproach upon me the living God, as if there were not an all-sufficiency in me, but I will make the reproach to turn upon their own heads; yea, they reproach my saints too, but I will make this to return upon their own heads. O take heed of doing any thing to bring a reproach upon God.

You will say, Can the creature bring a reproach upon God?

I might show you divers ways: I will instance but one,

Apostatizing from God. When professors of religion, that have been very forward and seemed to rejoice in the ways of God and to rely upon him, forsake God to follow after their vain lusts, I say, these do bring a reproach upon God himself. In Heb. x. 29, they are said to do "despite to the Spirit of grace," they wrong and bring a reproach ἐπιβιβισαν upon the Spirit of grace. And Heb. vi. 6, it is written, they put the Son of God "to an open shame;" they make him a reproach παραδειγματισσοντες before all. As when you cart people up and down the city you hold them out as a scorn; so they put the Son of God to open shame; they do (as it were) hold forth the Son of God to open shame. There is more good to be had in a whore than in Jesus Christ, and God, and the blessed Spirit; that is the language of a whoremonger, and all apostates, however diversified, their sins are like-minded.

Well, ye apostates, from whence is it that the people of God are reproached, but because of you? Do you then bring a reproach upon God. upon his name, upon profession, upon his saints? the Lord has ways to turn the reproach upon yourselves; and usually such men as these, before they die, God puts to open shame, he leaves them to such vile courses as they come to be a shame, a by-word, a scorn, and cast out as dung and filth, not only to the churches, but from such as have any kind of civility or morality at all. O, take heed of bringing a reproach upon God, and so upon his saints. O, let the saints go on in a constant way of holiness and faithfulness; God will wipe away their reproach, the Lord will return the reproach upon the heads of such as seek to reproach them. But when there comes a reproach upon the wicked, it shall be another manner of reproach than upon the saints, it is called "a perpetual reproach;" the reproach of the saints is not a perpetual reproach, but when it is upon the ungodly it shall be a perpetual reproach; and in Jer. xlii. 18, those two things are joined together, "a curse, and a reproach." So Neh. iv. 4, "Hear, O God, for we are despised; and turn their reproach upon their own heads." Sanballat and Tobiah did reproach the servants of God, who sought in the uprightness of their hearts to honour God; but, Lord, "turn their reproach upon their own heads," saith Nehemiah.

And truly this is the best way, when the servants of God are reproached; though they may by lawful means seek to vindicate their names, yet their chief resource is to pray, Lord, turn the reproach upon the heads, or into the bosoms, of our adversaries.

Obs. 6. God will be Lord, let the wicked do what they can. "And his reproach shall his Lord return unto him." "His Lord;" what! is God the Lord of this people? "His Lord;" as if the prophet should say, You reject God and will not be in subjection to him, you will not own him to be your Lord; but he will be your Lord in spite of your hearts. Christ has purchased to be Lord over the world, and he will be Lord over all, over all apostates, hypocrites, wicked men; let them do what they can, Jesus Christ will be Lord over them in spite of their hearts.

Oh it is a blessed thing to give up ourselves willingly to the subjection of Jesus Christ. If we say, "We will not have this man to rule over us," Christ will say, But I will rule over you; "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear," Isa. xlv. 23. "Be still, and know that I am God," Psal. xlv. 10. So I say to the most troublesome and tumultuous spirit, that would cast off the yoke of God; Be still, thou wretched, thou proud spirit, and know that God is the Lord, he will prevail against you. God made Julian to know this, when struck by a dart he cast his heart blood into the air, with an O thou Galilean, thou hast overcome me! And so all wicked men shall be forced to say one day, Well, though I would cast off the commands of God behind my back, and break his cords, yet the Lord has overcome me; and though I perish to all eternity, yet God will be God blessed for ever, and Lord of the whole earth.

Julian the apostate.

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1. When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died.

THIS chapter is partly legal and partly evangelical. Legal; charging this people with their sin of idolatry and of ingratitude, showing them God's wrath, partly already inflicted, and further threatened them, to the 14th verse, and again in the 15th and 16th verses, there returning to further threats; but in the 14th verse there is something mixed of the gospel in the midst of these charges and threats. Ephraim would have put off all the evil that came on him upon God; but God charges Ephraim himself with it: all the change of Ephraim's condition from what it had been, comes from his own sin; and the evil that is like further to come upon him will be for his own sin.

"When Ephraim spake, trembling;" not, when Ephraim spake tremblingly; but, when Ephraim spake, (there should be a stop,) trembling; as much as if it were said, there was trembling when Ephraim spake, those that heard him did tremble. When Ephraim spoke, there was trembling. There was a time when Ephraim was very honourable among the tribes, when the very speaking of Ephraim had great power, and took great impression upon whomsoever he spake to. Yea, though Ephraim was the younger brother, that came of Joseph, yet, by the guidance of the hand of God upon Jacob's hand, the blessing came upon him more especially; and so from time to time God put much honour upon this tribe of Ephraim, according to the blessing he had from Jacob, when his right hand did lay hold upon the head of Ephraim. Joshua was of the tribe of Ephraim, and when Joshua spake what trembling was there among all the people! what mighty power and authority had he! And you read in Judg. viii. 1, 2. in their speaking to Gideon, what trembling they caused, and what yielding presently ensued: "And the men of Ephraim said unto him, Why hast thou served us thus, that thou calledst us not, when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites? And they did chide with him sharply. And he said unto them, What have I done now in comparison of you? Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abi-ezer?" And so in Judg. xii., when Ephraim came to fight with Jephthah they had thought to have done the same, they spake great and swelling words; Ephraim took much upon him, and made account that all should tremble and shake when he spake.

"He exalted himself in Israel." Jeroboam was of the tribe of Ephraim, and so it refers in a more especial manner to him, and his house, the princely power being put upon that tribe of Ephraim in Jeroboam, and they having power in their hands prevailed very much at the first, and caused trembling in all those to whom they spake. As if the Holy Ghost should say, There is a great change now in Ephraim, he is not now as he was, nor likely to continue so. Ephraim presuming upon his excellency, and upon his strength and worth, ventured to sin, "he offended in Baal," that is, in a way of idolatry, for so Baal sometimes is a general word for an idol: Jer. ix. 14, "But have walked after the imagination of their own heart, and after Baalim," after their idols. And the Chaldee paraphrase seems to allow of this; They did sin, in that they did worship idols.

"When he offended in Baal." But though this is meant immediately of Jeroboam, including his calf, yet it has special reference to the idolatry that was afterwards in this princely tribe, in the successors of Jeroboam, and in a more special manner in Ahab; 1 Kings xvi. 31, he did not satisfy himself in worshipping of the calves, but added this, to worship Baal, the god of the Sidonians.

"He died."

"He died." His spirit even died; he was of a stout, but afterwards came to be of a low, base, and sordid spirit, and so "died." They were under the sentence of death; Jeroboam's house was cut off, and Ahab's house cut off; and the people died at last; they became vile and contemptible, so that every body could insult them. When a lion is alive and roars, he is terrible to all the beasts; but the most timorous thing will run over, or trample upon, a dead lion. So Ephraim was terrible to all about him, but when he had "offended in Baal" his honour was taken from him, and he was fain to crouch to every one and the wrath of God pursued and never left him, nor his family, nor the people, but they died and came to nothing. Oh the poor spirit that there was in this tribe after they "offended in Baal!" In 1 Kings xx., you shall see what a low and mean spirit they had: whereas before, when they spake men trembled, none could make them tremble; but there, ver. 1—4, it is said of Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, that he "gathered all his host together;" "and he sent messengers to Ahab king of Israel into the city, and said unto him, Thus saith Ben-hadad, Thy silver and thy gold is mine; thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine. And the king of Israel answered and said, My lord, O king, according to thy saying, I am thine, and all that I have." They had a low and mean spirit, yielding to any thing; and yet of a perverse, froward spirit, to be cruel over those that were under them: the Lord was departed from them, and so their spirits were gone, and they were as a dead carcass, which every one could insult with impunity. Thus you have the general meaning of this scripture; yet we shall consider it more particularly when we examine it in reference to Jeroboam. But from what has been said, there are these observations:

Obs. 1. It is an honour to have respect from others when we speak, to have what we say received with reverence and respect, showing that it impresses the hearts of others, and is not cast out as a vain and worthless thing. Thus Job describes his honour, chap. xxix. 9, 10, "The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth. The nobles held their peace, and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth." And in the 21st verse, "Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel." A great honour it was to Job, that when he spake his speech was so regarded.

Let children, and servants, and all inferiors, learn to give due honour to those whom God has set above them; not to scorn at nor slight their words, nor when they speak to them to go away and smile and jeer; but it is fit when a father speaks to his child, that the child show reverence and respect in its very countenance and carriage; and so when masters speak to their servants, and superiors to their inferiors. But especially let us give God such honour when he speaks, oh let there then be trembling! Should inferiors honour their superiors by showing reverence when they speak? O let us give this to God. "Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word," Psal. ciii. 20. The angels excel in strength; and what! do they slight and disregard the word of God? Oh no, they hearken unto the voice of his word, showing for it a reverent respect; and it infinitely becometh us, when God speaks, to "stand in awe," and "do his commandments."

Obs. 2. Those who are in place of power over others account it their honour, not only that those under them should regard, but that they should tremble at what they say. Man greatly delights to lift up himself above others, and to lord it imperiously over them: we might give divers examples of men who have had great power in their hands, who, when any thing has displeased them, would speak so as to make others to shake and tremble: nay, not only men in great place will do this, but you will find the same disposition in men that are very mean and of a very low rank. And in families too, how many when they do but speak to their wives, though they be collateral, and not directly under them, yet how imperiously will they speak, yea, so as even to make the house shake almost! and so with their servants and children; and this they account their glory. My brethren, though this be often through much distemper, and pride, and vanity in men, to delight to make all that are under them to tremble when they speak, yet this is an honour due to God, and God expects it from us; for the Lord is infinitely above us, we are all under the feet of God, and at his disposal, both for our present and eternal state.

And it is fit for us therefore to show reverence to God when he speaks, to have a heart to tremble at his word, that is what God looks for. So Isa. lxvi. 2, "To this man will I look," saith the Lord, "even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word:" the word that God speaks is that which has the dreadful authority of God in it; it is that which binds conscience, that word which, if thou obeyest not, will bind thee over to eternal death. It becomes the greatest monarchs in the world to tremble when God speaks: oh! who art thou that canst stand against the voice of God? Oh, bold and hard of heart art thou, that canst stand out against God's voice. "The voice of the Lord is powerful; the voice of the Lord is full of majesty," Psal. xxix. 4. And Hab. iii. 16, "When I heard, my belly trembled; my lips quivered at the voice: rottenness entered into my bones, and I trembled in myself." This is the honour that is due to God. Oh, it is a comely thing to see a congregation sit even trembling under the word of God, manifesting their hearts to be affected with the authority and majesty of that which God speaks; for "the voice of God is full of majesty."

"When Ephraim spake, there was trembling."

This the prophet mentions as an aggravation of his sin and misery afterwards. As if the prophet should say, There was a time that God did subdue the hearts of people, so that Ephraim had a great deal of authority over those that were under him; "when Ephraim spake, there was trembling." Whence, with Pareus,

Obs. 3. The subjection of the hearts of men to those in authority, is a work of God, God is to have the glory of it. It is from God that the hearts of multitudes are brought under some few, so as to fear them, and to receive what they speak with trembling. Thus we read in Josh. iv. 14, "On that day the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel; and they feared him, as they feared Moses, all the days of his life." Before Moses's death Joshua was but his servant, and we do not read that he was so magnified among the people that they feared him. No, the fear was then upon Moses, because Moses was in place of authority; but when Moses was taken away, and Joshua was to succeed him, then the Lord magnified him, the Lord put a lustre upon him, and the Lord caused the people to fear him, as they had feared Moses. It is a work of God to cause people to fear magistrates. So in Dan. v. 19, "For the majesty that he gave him," that is, that God gave the king, "all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him." It is God that puts majesty upon governors, to make those that are under to fear. Psal. lxxvii. 14 deserves to be noted; it is there said of God, "Thou art the God that doest wonders." What are those wonders and marvellous things? If you read, you shall find among others, "Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron;" that is reckoned among the wonders and marvellous things that God did, that he did lead his people "like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron." That so great a multitude should be so led by the hands of two, is a wonderful work of God, God is to have the glory of it; it is for the maintaining of government and order in the world, that God so subdues the hearts of many under few.

Obs. 4. The meaner the beginnings of men are, the more imperious oftentimes they prove in power. "When Ephraim spake, there was trembling." This was the younger brother, and had power, not according to the ordinary common course, but by a special providence of God; and so we very often find that men of mean quality and inferior rank, if any providence raises them above others, they prove the most imperious.

Obs. 5. Sin will bring men's honour down. "But when he offended in Baal, he died." Though there was a time that every one revered Ephraim, and did much regard what they spake, yet, they falling to sin and wickedness, it is just with God to bring their honour and esteem down, to bring them into the dust, and to make them vile and contemptible in the eyes of those that ere while did reverence them. We find this threatened both to magistrates and ministry. With respect to magistrates, in Job xii. 21, "He poureth contempt upon princes;" God pours contempt; though they had very great honour and esteem, yet through their sin contempt is thrown upon them. And then for those in the ministry, in Mal. ii. 9, "Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people." "The priest's lips should keep knowledge," and those that were faithful were very honourable; but when they became "partial in the law," that is, when they began to turn the word of God to their own ends, the Lord made them vile in the eyes of the people. The main charge against them was, that they were "partial in the law;" they would handle the word of God partially, what they could get to drive on their own ways by, they would improve that to the uttermost, and turn the word which way they pleased; they thought by this means to prevail, and to get esteem of the people, yet this was the thing that God threatens, to make them thereby to be vile and contemptible in the eyes of the people. When people come to discover that men do indeed drive on their own designs and their own ends in the ways of God, nothing will take away their repute and their honour more. Oh the great change that there is in the honours and esteem of men! God for their sin casts them out, and there pours contempt on their names, as those who have outlived their honours, even in the very hearts of the saints. Indeed when there is a change in the outward condition from prosperity to afflictions, then wicked and carnal men will not regard those whom they before honoured. As in Job's case, in chap. xxix. he tells us how he was honoured, and regarded, and revered where he lived in prosperity; but when he was in affliction, chap. xxx. 1, he saith, "But now that I am younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock." This is our wickedness, to change our minds of the esteem of men because of their prosperity or adversity; it evidences great vanity of spirit: surely, if now God by his providence has brought down, in regard of his outward estate, one who has been high in place and godly in the exercise of his functions, he is yet to be honoured still, continuing in his integrity and holiness. But now I speak of this as a judgment of God upon men, when God casts out their names from the very hearts of the saints, and that worthily too, when they deserve to be looked upon as dead carcasses, though heretofore in much honour and esteem. Heretofore they were as gardens that had many sweet flowers, excellent common gifts, for which they were respected; but now like gardens overgrown with weeds, which no man regards. As houses that were hung with costly hangings, but afterwards pulled down and nothing left but the bare walls; so their gifts were very precious. As houses once opulent, which their owners have deserted, leaving nothing but bare walls, it may be mice and vermin run up and down in rooms that were once hung bravely; so it is with many who had excellent gifts, which were highly honoured and esteemed by people that knew them, but now the hangings are gone, there is nothing but vermin running up and down in their spirits. Oh what a mighty havoc sin will make! how it will bring men's honours down!

Let men therefore take heed of trusting in their former repute, for let them have done what they will heretofore, yet if they depart from God their honour will depart too. Men that are in place of authority, or in the ministry, had need consider this point well; for it is a matter of great moment for them to keep up their repute and esteem, that they may be the more useful, and do service, not only for themselves, but for God. And it is one of the great designs of the devil, to seek to cast dirt upon those whom God is wont to use as instruments for good: oh, it concerns them to look to it that they be chargeable with nothing justly.

It is very observable how God remembers Ephraim for dishonour a long time after. In Revelation, chap. vii., where the tribes are reckoned up, only two tribes are left out, Dan and Ephraim; Ephraim is not mentioned there by his own name, but by the name of Joseph; and the reason that is given is, because those two tribes were ringleaders in idolatry. If you read Judg. xviii., you find the children of Dan there setting up "the graven image;" and you know the great changes that Ephraim made in the worship of God, by Jeroboam's setting up of calves, and so afterwards sinning in Baal: hence the great dishonour by omission that God put on them afterwards.

"When Ephraim spake."

"Spake" what? What did Ephraim speak when he caused trembling? Our observations hitherto have been general, but referring it to Jeroboam, that was of Ephraim, and so to his courtiers, what did they speak? They spake these two things, and so caused trembling in the hearts of the people.

I. About the alteration in the government, about the taking off the ten tribes from the house of David; "What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse," 1 Kings xii. 16. When this was mentioned, there was trembling; it did certainly at first cause the people's hearts to shake, they thought it was a very great matter, they knew not what would come of it; what! to forsake the house of David, and to have a change of government? this caused many thoughts of heart, and much trembling, lest evil might result. "When he spake, there was trembling," but, "he exalted himself." Notwithstanding such concussions of spirit, yet Jeroboam went on in his way, and would venture the worst; let come of it what would, he would on, "he exalted himself." But then afterwards he sins in his idolatry, as his successors sin in their Baal, and then "he died;" God struck him, and his family, and so the ten tribes. From whence our notes of observation are,

Obs. 6. Alteration in government is a matter of very great hazard and difficulty. Men that have to deal in any kind of alteration in matter of government, had need be very wise in their carriage in it in respect of the people, for much depends upon them. When there was any alteration in government there was trembling, mighty fears and troubles in the hearts of the people.

Obs. 7. Resolved spirits will break through difficulties.

Obs. 8. When God intends to have a work accomplished, he will raise up men to go through with it, notwithstanding any difficulties there are in it. "He exalted himself." Though the people's minds were very much troubled, and there was a great deal of shaking throughout the land, yet he lifts up himself; he had some encouragement from the prophet, and otherwise, so that he could go through with the matter. It was a purpose which God had purposed, that he might fulfil what was threatened to Solomon for his former sin.

Obs. 9. If the workers together with God, after duties are accomplished, rest in their own parts or strength, so as to forsake and sin against God, it is just with him to leave them, that they shall vanish and come to nothing. "He exalted himself," and prevailed in what he spake, notwithstanding the trembling of the people; and now, having got himself warm in the nest, and strong in his kingdom, he lifts up himself in another manner, and forsakes God, and trusts in his own strength, and then he dies; God casts him off.

Men had need take heed, though they be carried through many and great difficulties by a spirit more than ordinary, they had need take heed (I say) that afterwards they do not walk in their own strength, but walk humbly before God; if they forsake God, they will die and perish.

II. About the alteration in religion: this likely caused more trembling than the other. What did Jeroboam speak? That now they were not to go up to worship at Jerusalem, God did not stand upon such things; no, they might save themselves that long journey: and so there was a calf set up at Dan and Beth-el, and they must go and worship there: this was a mighty alteration in their worship. And surely when this was mentioned first to the people, there could not but have been great trembling: the spirits of the godly surely would tremble at such a motion, they would look upon it as a most dreadful curse of God upon the kingdom, that there should be such a change in the matters of religion, from truth to falsehood; and even among others, too, there was a general trembling, for men have some kind of conscience with regard to religion and the worship of God, and this was so flat against the word, that where there was but any conscience of God they could not but have had some fear, they could not tell what might come of it, and therefore there could not but be a very great confusion of spirit in the people of the land. At first this was so; but yet afterwards their spirits became dead spirits, that he might do with them what he would: and so they joined with Jeroboam, and even with Ahab, and sinned more and more.

Obs. 10. Alteration in religion is a very difficult business. It cannot be expected but the hearts of people will stir much upon the alteration of religion; though it be from worse to better, yet the hearts of people will stir very much at first. When the Reformation from popery took place here, what a stir was there! they were presently ready to take up arms in Cornwall. What ado was there for the book of Common Prayer! so that the king was fain to write to them, that it was no other than the sum of what they had before, only translated into English, with some amendments. And certainly the casting out of prelacy has caused a great deal of trembling; a great ado there is. How hard it is to get but a single rotten tooth out of a man's head! it costs a great deal of pain and trouble. Though the wars were undertaken for the maintenance of our liberties, as subjects and men, and for the civil right we have to our religion also; yet we see that the very thoughts of any kind of change whatever in matters of religion, causes the hearts of men to shake and to be unsettled. A change in matters of religion, even though from the worse to the better, is an affair of great moment, and therefore requires much prayer. If it cause trembling when the change is from the better to the worse, it will likewise cause trembling where it is changed from the worse to the better; and therefore it requires that all the godly should join all their strength together, against those that would oppose their strength against it.

Obs. 11. Men of resolute spirits will go on, even in matters of religion, though it be from the better to the worse. You may say, The people will not bear nor endure it. Yea, but they will venture to go on with their way and design, though it be from the better to the worse; but now, if the change be from the worse to the better, then it is a special gift of God to give men hearts to persevere, notwithstanding difficulties.

Obs. 12. Gradual encroachments under fair shows further designs. "He exalted himself," though there were "trembling:" that is, he succeeded in this his change of religion, not by open violence presently, but he carried things on by fair shows, one thing after another, and so prevailed with the people. This is the way to compass an object.

Obs. 13. God's long-suffering must not be abused. "but when he offended in Baal, he died." Though God may suffer men to make some alterations in religion, though they be for the worse, and let them prosper, yet if they will grow from one degree to another in forsaking God, then God comes upon them with his wrath, and they die; if they know not where to hold, God will not continue patient towards them any longer.

Obs. 14. A family or people from which God has withdrawn his protection and blessing, is as a dead carcass. "He died." I understand similarly Matt. xxiv. 28, "For whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." Though it is true that this is spoken about the coming of Christ, yet I do not think that the carcass is Christ, and the saints the eagles, although it has been interpreted so by several; but Christ's coming, here meant, is his coming against Jerusalem, his coming in his judgments against the people of the Jews: they were now as a dead carcass, God having forsaken them; and the eagles, birds of prey, would come upon them: this might refer particularly to the Romans, whose ensign is the spread eagle. The body of the Jews that had forsaken God and his truth, and so were but as a dead carcass, would become the prey of those eagles. A people or family that forsakes God and his worship is as a dead carcass, the prey of the spoiler.

Obs. 15. Corruption of worship causes God thus to withdraw from a people, and make them to be as a dead carcass. "But when he offended in Baal, he died." As it was said of Troy, so long as they kept the Palladium, the image of Minerva, Troy was impregnable, but when that was gone, then was it overcome and spoiled; so when God's worship, which is the life and safety of a place, is corrupted and gone, then cometh death. Though I do not think that God always observes the same strictness in matters of worship as with the Jews; for the Jews certainly, though they had a covenant of grace in which God dealt with them, yet they had too a special covenant which God made with them, respecting their being in the land of Canaan. Now indeed God goes by general rules, that is, to punish the disobedient and to reward those that are godly, his ways now towards nations and people, with regard to outward punishments and mercies, are but according to general rules; but his administration towards the Jews, besides general rules, were according to a special covenant made with them about their living in the land of Canaan, either prosperously, or in adversity.

Obs. 16. When wicked men are most active in evil, yet then may they be under the sentence of death. When they seem to have the greatest power to do what they list, yet then they may be as a dead people. "When he offended in Baal, he died." If you will but observe the story, for these prophets cannot possibly be understood without reference to the history in Kings and Chronicles: observe but the account in the Kings: when was it that Ephraim "offended in Baal?" It was in Ahab's time; they were never more active for their idolatrous ways than then, nor was there ever more violence or cruelty exercised on the prophets of the Lord; for then Jezebel had her hundred prophets set at her table, but the prophets of God were fain to be hid in a cave, and Elijah to shift for his life: and yet "when he offended in Baal, he died." Died! why he seemed to be full of life, and activity, and vigour, and thought to do what he list, and to trample all under feet that would stand against that way of worship. But for all this their bravery and pride they were dead, saith the Holy Ghost, they were a base people, and under the sentence of death; God was gone from them, and they were decaying, and so they should deny him more and more till they utterly perished. "When he offended in Baal, he died."

Ver. 2. And now they sin more and more, and have made them molten images of their silver, and idols according to their own understanding, all of it the work of the craftsmen: they say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.

"And now they sin."

The family of Ephraim and the ten tribes, for so Ephraim is taken for Jeroboam sometimes, and sometimes for the whole tribe, and sometimes for the governors, and sometimes for all the ten tribes as distinct from Judah.

"Now they sin more and more."

From whence I beseech you observe the taking in the people now together with Ephraim: at first it was, "when he offended in Baal, he died;" but now it is said, "they sin more and more:" all the people join with him in sin.

At first, when he began to speak about the alteration of religion, the people trembled to think of it; but it seems afterwards they could swallow it down well enough, they could join with Jeroboam, yea, and Ahab too, "more and more;" let them impose what they would upon them, they could yield to it.

Obs. 1. Use makes a mighty alteration in men's spirits. How many men's hearts and ways are different from what they seemed to be! If one had mentioned formerly such things as they do now, they would have trembled. If about six years since one could but have presented in a map all our speeches and actions one against another, and told us how things should be, our hearts would have shaken, and we would have trembled at the very thoughts of it; but now "more and more" we go on, and God knows whether we shall go: oh the alteration that a little time makes in men's spirits! Now (saith he) they are a dead, heartless people; you may do what you will with them; they will now do things altogether opposed to their former principles. A man would wonder that this people, who were so astonished at the bare thoughts of the change in religion, should now be swallowed up in idolatry.

Obs. 2. The sudden affections and sudden expressions of people are never to be regarded. Though people may seem to be up and very forward in their affections and expressions, yet, I say, never rest too much upon them. Nothing is more uncertain than the spirits of the multitude, and therefore it is the most irrational thing for any of wisdom to think to carry things that way for a constancy; you may find them forward in one way at one time, but they will be quickly off again, and that which one time they will extol, at another time they will cry down; and such alteration of spirits these times will be a witness to, I believe, as great as ever occurred from the beginning of the world. "Now they sin more and more."

"And now."

There is a great emphasis in this particle, "now." "They sin more and more;" that is, even "now," when the very sentence of death was out against them, even "now" they do it. Thus did Ahab in 1 Kings xvi. 30, "And Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him;" he added evil to evil. From whence, Obs. 3. When destruction is nearest evil men are most wicked. Now their sin ripens apace: when the scum grows highest, then it is nearest the fire; and so the nearer it is to the fire the higher it will grow. It is a great sign that the times of men are not long, when they grow notoriously wicked. See a man that hitherto has been forward in that which is good, he may have failings, and yet the Lord may pity him; but now let this man grow to be very wicked, not only to abate of his profession, but to become openly sinful, expect the ruin of that man suddenly, it will not tarry long.

Obs. 4. It is a great aggravation of men's wickedness to sin after God threatens, and in the times of judgment, when they are under God's hand. Oh, when God appears against us we should presently submit, at the least holding up of his finger: but this is the pride of men, not to stoop even when the hand of God is against them, and the rather because they would justify their sin; if they should stoop and yield on the hand of God coming out against them, this would debase them, but they rather will stand out the more that they might justify their sin, that they are not as men would take them to be.

Obs. 5. When men have lost their credits, honour, and esteem through the just judgment of God, they grow more base and vile in their sinful ways than ever. Ephraim had a great deal of esteem and honour, but he lost it through God's just judgment, and now he, and the people together, "sin more and more." We find this usual, that men's esteem and credit, though they have very base hearts within all the while, yet will keep them in a very fair way; and, on the contrary, many who have lived very fair so long as they had esteem and credit, yet if their credit be but cracked, and their esteem gone, will prove very base and sordid. As in a garden, if a man have but a few weeds in it, he will have them pulled up; but if it be overgrown with weeds, then he cares not much for it, but lets it run more and more: so in men's hearts, though there be something amiss in them, and yet their names kept up, they will reform; but if once they have fallen, so that their honour, credit, and esteem are gone, they go on further and further in wickedness. Or as it is with a man when he has a new garment, he is afraid at first of every little spot, and much more of a rent; but when afterwards the garment becomes much sullied, he becomes careless of it, he never stands brushing of it as before: it is thus for all the world with men in respect of their hearts and of their lives, and therefore it is good for them to look to it betimes, when their names begin but a little to be lost, when they may see the just hand of God beginning to come, then to reform; for if they let themselves go upon liberty, they will grow vile and abominable. "They sin more and more."

Obs. 6. There is no stop in apostacy. Let men once apostatize from God, and there is no stop then; they cannot tell whether they may go, if once they begin to roll down. A man may think thus, I will but roll thus far, and there I will stop. No, if once you begin to roll, you will roll and roll down to the bottom; you know not whither you may roll, or where you may fall. If a man should leap into the water, and say, I will sink but thus far, to the middle and no farther, this were but folly; you will sink more and more: so it is with apostates; I verily believe those that did make slight at first, did not think that they should go so far, Oh, God forbid that they should do things so vile and so abominable! yea, but when once they are rolling, when once they are sinking, they roll and sink more and more, till they roll into the bottomless pit of hell; they sink more and more, till they sink into the very bottomless gulf, into such things as they would before have shrunk from with abhorrence. There is a curse upon the wicked in Psal. xxxv. 6, "Let their way be dark and slippery; and let the angel of the Lord persecute them." When men will go out of the ways of God into slippery paths of their own, it is just with God that an evil spirit should drive them on in those ways. As in your travelling in champaign countries, a highway goes to such a town, and another lies close by it, and you, it may be, choose the wrong one, and so go on and think it will bring you to the place where you are travelling; but it winds so that you go further and further from the right road, perhaps many miles before you are aware of it: so it is in apostacy; it may be, at first, when men depart from the ways of God they think it not of much moment, but then these evil ways wind gradually, and, it may be, almost imperceptibly, widening the distance between them and God. "They sin more and more."

I will give you the steps of an apostate's departure from God.

1. Some slight sin against knowledge, though never so little, for sin of mere infirmity I cannot call apostacy; but if it be ever so little a sin against knowledge, it breaks the bond of obedience: when you will venture to do that which you know is against God, this bond of obedience being broken, no marvel though you fall and "sin more and more."

2. Every act of sin tends to increase the habit. Corruption grows by acting; as with grace, every act of grace extends grace in the heart of a man; and the way to grow in grace is, to act grace much; so that when you are acting your grace, you do not only that which is your duty, but you are growing in grace: so when you are acting of corruption, you are not only doing that which is evil, but you are increasing the tendency to it; and therefore every sin that causes us to decline from God, makes us to go more and more from God.

3. Every sin against conscience weakens the work of conscience. The authority of conscience will quickly be weakened when it is once broken; break but off the yoke of conscience, and conscience will be weaker than it was before. The first time a man sins against conscience, his conscience, having a great deal of strength in it, mightily troubles him; but having had a flaw, (as it were,) it grows weaker. I remember a notable story which that reverend and famous divine, Dr. Preston, relates of one in Cambridge, who, after having committed a great sin, had this temptation, Do the act again, and your conscience will trouble you no more: this temptation prevailed with him, he did it again, and then he grew a very sot indeed, and went on in his wickedness. Every sin does somewhat to weaken conscience, and therefore one that falls off from God will "sin more and more."

4. A man loses his comfort in God according to the degree of his departure from him. For some kind of comforts hypocrites may have; as there may be common gifts of the Spirit to enable them to do service, so there may be common gifts of the Spirit to comfort them, they may taste of the powers of the world to come. Many have some flashes of joy; but when they are departed from God they cannot have so much comfort as they were wont to have, and when they have not that comfort they must have it some way, and are fain to go sharking up and down to get it some where else: I cannot have that comfort in God which I was wont to have; I was wont, when I was troubled, to go and read the word, I could find comfort there; let me go into good company, I could find comfort there; but in the presence of God I could find comfort; but now I cannot: and so the heart must have comfort some way or other, and therefore goes more and more from God.

5. When one has sinned against God, holy duties become very unsuitable to his soul. It is a more difficult thing to engage his heart in them than before, and so he comes to neglect duties, and by neglecting them his corruption grows. They were a powerful means to restrain corruption; for when a man is abroad and inclined to licence, yet when he thinks thus, Yea, but before I go to bed I must pray, and how shall I then beg grace from God, when now I willfully sin against him? this curbs a man: so long as he can keep any kind of suitableness between his heart and holy duties, though he should fail in some things, he would quickly recover; but when he begins to have holy duties so veiled as to leave them off, then he will "sin more and more," for the curb is removed.

6. The presence of God is terrible to an apostate. He cannot think of God without some terror; before he would often think and speak of God, but now he puts off the thoughts of God, the thoughts of him and his presence being terrible; it must needs be that he must wander up and down even more and more, be as a Cain wandering away from the presence of God.

7. The thoughts of whatsoever might turn an apostate's heart to God, are grievous to him. If he thinks of turning to God, presently will be presented to him some difficulty that will make him even put off all those thoughts, and rather give himself liberty to his own ways.

8. One sin cannot be maintained without another. As now, you find when one man has done wrong to another, he knows not how to carry it out but by doing him more wrong, to crush him if he can. And so there are divers sins that have many sins depending upon them; if a man be engaged in a business that is sinful, that he may carry it on successfully he must commit a great many other sins, and so fall off more and more.

9. The pride of men's hearts is such, that they will attempt to justify transgression. Men love to justify what they have done; when they have sinned, they will grow more resolute and violent, that all people might think that their hearts recoil not in the least. You think many times when you see men very strong and violent in an evil way, that surely they are fully satisfied in it; oh! you are mightily mistaken in that, they may be very violent and very strong in their way, only that they may persuade other folk, though their own consciences tell them that they are not satisfied. Thus the pride of men's hearts makes them "sin more and more."

10. When men have gone far in sin, they grow desperate. They little hope ever to recover themselves, and therefore "sin more and more."

11. God in his just judgment withdraws himself from apostates. God withdraws those gifts and common graces that they had, and saith, Let them go on; "he that is filthy, let him be filthy still."

12. God gives up apostates to their corruptions, and to the power of the devil. It is a dreadful thing when the church does it, although it be for the salvation of the soul, and for the destruction of the flesh, 1 Cor. v. 5; but when God delivers up one to his corruptions, it is for the soul's destruction: Do you rule him, saith God, because he would not be ruled. No marvel then though an apostate "sin more and more."

O, stand with all your might against the beginning of sin; tremble, and stop on the threshold. Had this people done so, at the first they trembled, oh, had they but kept that trembling heart continually, it would have preserved them from abundance of evil: and so, do not some of you remember that there has been a heart-trembling and hesitancy at the very thought of those things which, it may be, some of you now practise? oh, happy had it been for you had you kept such a frame! You young beginners, you tremble at temptations, you tremble at the thoughts of sin, at the first rising of corruption in your hearts; oh keep this frame, and regard not that boldness of spirit which there is in some. Some venture to the edge of the precipice, but it is a dangerous situation; rather keep a trembling, sin-fearing heart, for if you lose that, and begin but to tamper with some sin, if the devil thus beguile you, it is most likely that after the first offence you will sin more and more, and never pause till you are wholly involved in the snares of the devil.

And let us learn, my brethren, to be more and more in the ways of God, as apostates are more and more in the ways of sin. Oh that it were so with us! Let us not content ourselves to do a little for God, but still more and more, as David, in Psal. lxxi. 14, "I will yet praise thee more and more," I will add to thy praise, so the original signifies: Lord, some praise thou hast had in the world, oh that I could live to add any thing to it! "I will yet praise thee more and more."

Obs. 7. Idolatry is a very growing sin. "When he offended in Baal, he died," and now "they sin more and more." Gross idolatry has grown upon men under fair pretences and upon plausible principles.

My brethren, do but break this one bond in the matters of worship, that all worship must be by institution. I say, all the worship of God must be either that which is written in man's heart, or that which is in the word by institution: if so be that men will break this, and venture to exalt any creature beyond what God, either in a work of nature or by an institution, has raised it, then begins superstition; this, I say, is the fruitful source of all false worship, to raise any creature higher than God, either in nature or by institution, has raised it; do but venture to put upon any one ceremony more than nature or Divine institution has put upon it, and you know not where you shall stop. You know to what a height of idolatry popery is grown, but it began fair at first. And so we were going to most vile and abominable idolatry; but by what steps? We had broken the bond of regulating the worship of God by the word, and were bringing in men's own reason and inventions, and were beginning to put a religious respect upon that which God had never done: now do but grant such a licence in the least matters, and then you know not whither you will run in the way of idolatry, you will "sin more and more."

Oh let reformation be to us as idolatry is to wicked men, let us not rest in any degrees, but still reform more and more: idolaters will not stand still, oh why should they then who seek to reform stay their hands?

"And have made them molten images of their silver."

They were at great charge in making them, and so went on strongly in their way; though it cost them much, yet still they would go on.

"They have made them molten images."

Tertullian inveighs much against the maker of any images for religious services, and saith, It is not enough for you to say, We will not worship them, but you must not make them.

"Of their silver."

"Their silver" is put for their money; silver is used in divers languages for money in general. The calves were of gold, but it is said they were of silver, because the people contributed their money; and other images they added to them that they made by their money: their idolatry was chargeable to them. To avoid trouble in going to Jerusalem, and expenses in their sojourn there, they would not go to Jerusalem to worship; but they were willing to part with their silver for their idolatrous worship. Though men will not have God's service to be chargeable to them, yet their own ways are often so.

"And have made them molten images of silver, and idols according to their own understanding." The word עֲצִיבִים translated "idols" signifies griefs, or things that do terrify or cause grief: and indeed idolatry will bring grief, and men of superstitious, idolatrous spirits are often filled with fears. But this is all "according to their own understanding;" that is, as they thought fit themselves, such as should be suitable to their own ends, they took the liberty to tender up their respects to God according to their own inventions; and hence indeed comes superstition. Hence come the great corruptions in the worship of God; when men will interpose their own understandings, will leave the simplicity of the rule, and go their own way; when they think that the worship of God is not pompous enough of itself. They who do not worship God in a spiritual way, will labour to make up the want of the spiritual part by the addition of many externals, invented by "their own understanding;" and because such things in the service of God are rational to them, they think they must be acceptable to God, and therefore wonder that any should oppose them.

Calvin on this very text has most memorable expressions against men bringing their own understandings into the worship of God; saith he, * Here the worship of God is spoken of, in which whatsoever is of man's prudence, whatsoever is the dictate of mere reason, must yield, prudence and reason must give way; yea, whatsoever are the counsels of men, they must not judge by sense, by reason, or by prudence, in the matters of God's instituted worship; if they do permit themselves in the least degree, they do nothing but defile the worship of God. And again, he saith, This is the very principle whereby men must be taught to worship God aright, that they must be made fools first themselves. If men will come to worship God, they must deny and lay down their understandings, they must not so much as allow themselves to be wise. And thus he heaps these expressions one upon another, adding, Let them listen to the word of God alone, for this condemns whatsoever is pleasing to the judgment and reason of men.

God is indeed little beholden to men's understandings in those two things, matters of worship, and of faith. Respect, it may be, for the man, may somewhat the more make such an expression pass current, that it is the very principle of right worshipping of God for men to be fools. Hence many of the learned men of the world have accounted them fools and simple men; as heretofore the Nonconformists, were not they so accounted because they would not yield to those things which were imposed upon them? yea, we must be fools. It is true, when once we have an institution men's prudence and reason are required to guide us in the right management of it; but to raise up any thing in the worship of God beyond what I have warrant for in the word is no where allowed. In such a case it is not enough for men to say; This is good, and what hurt is there in it? and without this there will come a great deal of stir; and can any reasonable man deny its excellence? I say, when we come to matters of worship, wherein we expect a presence of God for a spiritual work on the soul of man, all these arguments we must lay aside, they are inadmissible. I cannot here argue for a thing, that it is good, and that I have need of it, and therefore must have it; but I may argue, that it is good, and that I have need of it, because instituted. Luther, likewise, saith, In matters of worship we must not regard so much what the thing is, but who it is that commands it; do not let us lean to our own understandings. Thus much for their sin of idolatry.

* Hoc agitur de cultu Dei. in quo cessare debet quicquid est prudentie, quicquid est rationis in hominibus, quicquid est sensus et omnium corum sensus; nam si hic tantillum sibi permittant, nihil aliud quam Dei cultum vitiant. Hoc principium est rite colendi Dei, ut homines stulti fiant neque permittant sibi sapere, sed tantum prebeant auren Deo; Hic damnat quicquid ardet iudicio hominum vel rationi. Calv. in loc.

But further, they thought to carry themselves in a prudent way, but the Lord condemns it as sottish; they thought they were very wise in it, yea, but their wisdom was very foolishness. For there follows,

"All of it the work of the craftsmen: they say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves."

As if he should say, What a sottish thing is this, that when they themselves put all its excellency on the creature, they will yet worship it, and say to the men that sacrifice, "Kiss the calves!" Whereas God challenges worship on this ground, because he is himself the supreme, the only source of all excellency.

Obs. 8. Those who trust most to their own understandings in matters of worship, God gives most up to sottishness. I say, if men will venture to go according to their own understandings in worship, God may justly give them up to sottishness, and none are given up more than those who think to be most prudent and wise. In Isa. xxix. 13, God saith, "Their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men." What then? "Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a marvellous work and a wonder." What is the marvellous work, what is the wonder? "The wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." What! they will lean on their own understandings in my worship, and they will prescribe what I should have, and they think they are very wise in what they do; I will do "a marvellous work and a wonder." What is this? I will cause "the wisdom of their wise men to perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid;" they shall be left to sottish and absurd ways, that all that are about them shall see that they are judicially blinded.

O my brethren, we see this fulfilled at this day; those that will venture upon their own understandings in worship, how hath the Lord left them to blindness! though men of excellent parts in former times, yet their parts begin to be blasted.

And observe it, you will find this to be the case more and more: such men as bring their own understandings into God's worship, I say, the Lord will blast at one time or other, so that others shall see, and take notice, and stand and wonder at it.

"All of it."

"All of it." As if he should say, If there were any thing of God in it, possibly it might be accepted, but when it is all of man—

This may be said of many of our services; they are all of man, there is nothing of God, nothing of the spirit of Christ in them; no marvel though they vanish, and we vanish in them.

"They say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves." וְהָיָה אֲדָרְשֵׁי יִשְׂרָאֵל The Seventy render these words thus, ἑθναὶ ἀνθρώπων, μύσχοι γὰρ ἐκλειψασαί which interpretation the Vulgate likewise adopts. In zeal to their idols they sacrificed men. According to which reading the sense would be, Those are worthy to kiss the calves that sacrifice men. This was forbidden, Lev. xviii. 21, and xx. 2. But it was done in a perverse imitation of Abraham, who would have offered up Isaac. It prevailed much among the heathen; the king of Moab sacrificed his eldest son, who should have reigned in his stead, 2 Kings iii. 27: and Tertullian saith, Apolog. cap. 9, that it continued till the time of Tiberius. Lactantius, Just. lib. i. cap. 21. records of the Carthaginians, that being vanquished by Agathocles, king of Sicily, they thought the gods were displeased with them, and that they might appease them, they sacrificed two hundred of the noblemen's sons.

The place where the Jews sacrificed men, was in Tophet, in the valley of the son of Hinnom. Hinnom is derived from a word signifying to lament, and roar, because of the noise of those that were sacrificed; whence Gehenna.

Tophet, of a word signifying to beat on a drum; which they used, not only to drown the noise, but all the kindred of the sacrificed person did rejoice with timbrels and dances in great mirth, till the sacrifice was fully consumed. The Hebrews are quoted by Selden De Diis Spris., Cognati omnes tympanis et chordis summa cum lætitiâ exultant quoad omnino combustus fuerit.

But to pass by that interpretation, and to take it as it is read in our books: by these words they call up the sacrificers, and encourage them in their idolatrous ways.

"Kiss." The kiss is a ceremony of worship; Psal. ii. 12, "Kiss the Son;" but also it expressed their love and delight, as well as their homage. Hercules' chin, in Sicily, was worn bare with kissing, saith Cicero. And if they could not reach the chin, then they kissed the hand. Hence Job xxxi. 27, "If my mouth hath kissed my hand." How foolish were they, Flavius, lib. 28. cap. 2. to forsake the blessed God to worship calves! How should we be forward and cheerful in the worship of the blessed God, in coming to kiss the Son!

Obs. 9. It is false worship, to give religious respect to any creature, by kissing, as well as by bowing to it. I know no reason why a book may not be set up to be owed to, as well as to be kissed, in taking an oath. The lifting up of the hand to the high God, in an oath, we find in Scripture, therefore that is safe.

Ver. 3. Therefore they shall be as the morning cloud, and as the early dew that passeth away, as the chaff that is driven with the whirlwind out of the floor, and as the smoke out of the chimney.

Here are four elegant similitudes to set forth Ephraim's weak, vanishing condition; God's power over them, the swiftness of the punishment, its violence, and his utter desolation, so that his place shall not be found.

1. "A morning cloud." Ephraim was risen, seemed to threaten great things, overcast the leaves like a cloud; but on the brightness of God's justice appearing, all was dispelled. Their "goodness" (chap. vi. 4) was "as a morning cloud, and as the early dew;" now they shall be so themselves.

2. "Early dew." The dew seems to bespangle the grass; but the sun rising, it is soon dried up. Ephraim's estate was beautiful, but the heat of God's wrath consumes all presently.

3. "Chaff." כֶּבֶץ signifies the smallest of the chaff, the dust of the hay-heap, and that abroad, where their floors were, and a whirlwind coming upon it. Psal. xxxv. 6, "Let them be as chaff before the wind: and let the angel of the Lord chase them."

Obs. 1. Many, when they begin to be unsettled, the angel of God, as a messenger of wrath, drives on apace to misery.

4. "Smoke." "The smoke out of the chimney;" it seems to darken the heavens, but presently it is scattered. The original signifies a chink or hole; because in Judea there were not such chimneys as we now use, but as it were windows, or open places in the upper part of the house, or in the wall, as at present in Norway and Sweden, saith a learned interpreter upon the place. We may hence,

Obs. 2. The vanity of proud men. Here God compares to such mean, vile things, persons that heretofore were so lofty. So 1 Kings xiv. 10, Jeroboam's house is threatened to be destroyed, "as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone."

Why then should wicked men be feared who are thus before the Lord? Do not bless yourselves in any prosperity, never think yourselves settled; for when you are most prosperous, and likely to continue so, yet are ye but "as the morning cloud;" yea, as "the early dew," "the chaff," "the smoke."

Ver. 4. Yet I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, and thou shalt know no god but me: for there is no saviour beside me.

"Yet I am the Lord thy God." This is spoken,

I. As an aggravation of their sin. "Yet I am the Lord thy God," as if he should say, You have thus provoked me, notwithstanding I am the Lord thy God. I have done very great things for you and for your forefathers.

Obs. 1. It is very evil to sin against great works of mercy. When we do any thing for another wherein we think we might gain him to ourselves for ever, and he yet—this is very grievous.

II. By way of encouragement. "Yet I am the Lord thy God;" I am ready to show thee the like mercy still. This is to break their hearts, and to provoke them to come in to the Lord. He speaks to an apostate people; as if he should say, Were you yet what you sometimes seemed to be, oh how gracious should I be to you! I am yet whatever I seemed to be to you; why are you so perverse towards me? Jer. ii. 2, "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown."

III. As a strong argument to obedience. "Yet I am the Lord thy God." When the will of God is once known, saith Luther, on Gen. xxvii., we are no further to dispose of rights, because neither parents, lords, nor masters have this title, "I am the Lord thy God."

"From the land of Egypt." As if he should have said, What a state had you been in, if I had not delivered you out of Egypt, from the iron furnace, a low, base employment! ye had been bond-slaves, and might have spent your days there in sorrow and trouble. Consider then, 1. Your low estate. 2. How your strength might have been spent. 3. When this anguish was upon you, what crying to me, and my delivering of you! Hence note, that,

Obs. 2. Deliverance from Egypt is a proof of God's being our God.

But does this concern us?

Much. There is a spiritual Egypt from which we have been delivered, as the apostle makes use of the paschal lamb in a spiritual sense, 1 Cor. v. 7. The power, severity, and holiness of God, appear in the delivery of his people from Egypt; so also in our deliverance from antichrist, as Rev. xv. 2, 3, the church is brought in singing the song of Moses (which the children of Israel sung for their deliverance from Pharaoh) for its deliverance from antichrist. Pharaoh was the dragon in the waters, Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14, so is antichrist, Rev. xii. The city of Zurich engraved the year of their deliverance from antichrist upon pillars in letters of gold.

"And thou shalt know no god but me."

That is, Thou shalt effectually acknowledge, worship, serve, love God as a God; no other.

Obs. 3. The end of God's great work is, that he may be known to be a God, a sincere, gracious, and holy One. The knowing God to be a God, is a special part of that worship which is due to God.

To acknowledge God to be God, is to know him in his excellency, majesty, and glory, above what is known of him by the light of nature.

This cannot but have a mighty operation on the heart. For,

To know God to be a God, is, 1. To know him to be the first Being of all. 2. The infinite, all-sufficient God. 3. The fountain of all good to his saints.

1. This must needs gain the heart to him. 2. There is no worship of God where this is not. 3. Where this is all follows. 4. The right knowledge of God keeps from false worship. "But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements," the Jewish ceremonial worship? Gal. iv. 9.

"Thou shalt know no god but me." This is the first commandment, of which Luther saith, All duties flow from that great ocean of the first commandment, and again return thither. We see the prophets to be most exercised in the use of the first commandment.

Obs. 4. It is not good to know idolaters' worship at all. For this is spoken in the text by way of opposition: "Thou shalt know no god but me;" that is, thou shalt be acquainted with no other worship. As in Deut. xii. 30, "Take heed to thyself, that thou inquire not, saying, How did these nations serve their gods?"

Therefore those that are not grounded, (and who is so grounded if it be against the precept of God?) should not even inquire after, much less go to see, the worship of idolaters.

Obs. 5. Nothing should be known or acknowledged to have any good in it, but with an infinite distance between it and God. "Thou shalt know no god but me;" that is, nothing but with a difference from me, as much as between God and the creature; "For who in the heaven can be compared unto the Lord? who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the Lord?" as saith the psalmist, Psal. lxxxix. 6, and elsewhere. There is an infinite distance between God and every creature: we may know creatures as creatures, but nothing as God, but God.

Obs. 6. We should know and acknowledge God when we are in misery and straits. So the church, "Verily thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour," Isa. xlv. 15. Many in time of prosperity will know God and acknowledge him; but when troubles come, they change their thoughts.

"For there is no saviour beside me." Hence the observations are:

Obs. 7. God delights to manifest himself a Saviour God. Thus Jer. xiv. 8, "O the hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in time of trouble." Isa. lx. 16, "Thou shalt also suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breast of kings: and thou shalt know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob;" and lxiii. 1, "Who is this that cometh from Edom?—I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save." And Acts v. 31, speaking of Christ, "Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Saviour, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins." There is his glory, and there should ours be also. He might manifest himself a God in our ruin.

Obs. 8. Saving mercies are great mercies.

Obs. 9. Though God does more for us than any, yet he receives not so much from us.

Obs. 10. No creature can do us any good further than God enables it.

Obs. 11. Our faith should be exercised on God as a Saviour, to whom there is none like. "Be strong in the Lord," (saith the apostle,) "and in the power of his might;" Eph. vi. 10: if our dangers are more than any, yet our Saviour is more than any also. "I will call on the Lord, who is worthy to be praised: so shall I be saved from mine enemies," 2 Sam. xxii. 4.

Obs. 12. God must be acknowledged in all salvation. "They forgot God their Saviour, which had done great things in Egypt," Psal. cvi. 21.

Obs. 13. We should make use of all God's saving mercies, to engage our hearts to him. For, 1. God saves from such evils as none else can. 2. He saves some from as great or greater than ever he has. 3. God saves from all evil. 4. Without means. 5. Above means. 6. Contrary to means. 7. None saves but by him. "There is no God else beside me; a just God and a Saviour; there is none beside me," Isa. xlv. 21. 8. God saves in all modes of saving, 2 Sam. xxii.; Psal. xviii.

But will he be such a Saviour to me in my condition?

Yes; he expresses himself thus in the midst of threats; in that chapter of Isaiah just cited, ver. 22, he saith, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth;" even then when he threatens, look up to him as a Saviour above all. God magnifies this his title every day, to some in one manner, to some in another: time is coming when he will magnify this in saving them wholly from all evil.

Obs. 14. Though God does us more good than any, yet for our hearts not to be with him as with other things, is vile.

Obs. 15. Happy are they who have an interest in this God. If we have interest but in one man that is able to do us good, we bless ourselves in it.

Obs. 16. We are never safe but when our peace is made with God.

Obs. 17. Unless you pray to God as a God, having all power to save, you pray to an idol. Isa. xlv. 20, "They have no knowledge that set up the wood of their graven image, and pray unto a god that cannot save."

Obs. 18. God is not worshipped as God, but when he is worshipped as a Saviour. It is not to say God is our God, but to rely on him as a Saviour.

Ver. 5. I did know thee in the wilderness, in the land of great drought.

"The wilderness," where there grew not one grain of corn. You who were so poor in the wilderness, depending on me for every morsel of bread; yet after, when you were fed, how proud and wanton grew you! "But Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked—then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation," Deut. xxxii. 15. In Ezek. xvi. 49, the Sodomites are condemned for behaving themselves contemptuously against the poor; but these do it against God.

God evidences this his knowledge and acknowledgment of them as his people, in leading them through the wilderness, by several instances and expressions: he takes notice of this wilderness, Deut. viii. 15, "Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness;" Luctus ubique pavor, et plurima mortis imago. He knew them as "a peculiar treasure above all people; a kingdom of priests, an holy nation," Exod. xix. 5, 6. "He kept him as the apple of his eye;" as an eagle beareth her young ones on her wings, "so the Lord alone did lead him," Deut. xxxii. 10—12. They "lacked nothing," chap. ii. 7. He led them "with his glorious arm," Isa. lxiii. 12.

Now God knew them in the wilderness, 1. In respect of their sin, which he visited. 2. In regard of their wants, which he provided for. We may connect both thus:

They went three days and found no water; and when they found it, it was so bitter they could not drink of it. Then he sweetened it by a miracle, Exod. xv. 22, 23, 25. Then in the wilderness of Sin they complained that the whole assembly would be slain with hunger; then came manna, a rain of manna, Exod. xvi. They loathed manna, and then quails were sent, Numb. xi. They "pitched in Rephdim, and there was no water," so that they were "almost ready to stone" Moses; then water out of the rock is given them, Exod. xvii. 1—6. But, ver. 8, "Then came Amalek and fought with Israel:" when Moses held up his hand Israel prevailed; and when Moses's hands hung down Amalek prevailed; at last Joshua discomfited them, ver. 9—13. Exod. xviii., Jethro is sent to refresh them, with Moses's wife, and his two sons; and chap. xix., xx., God gives them his law. Numb. xii., Miriam and Aaron contend with Moses; that sedition God rebukes. Numb. xiii., spies being sent, they discourage the people, yet God leads them on. Numb. xvi., Korah, Dathan, and Abiram conspire, upon which the earth opens and swallows up the rebels. "But," ver. 41, "on the morrow all the congregation," a hundred forty and seven thousand, murmur against Moses and Aaron for it; upon which the plague comes. They had other idols besides the calf, Amos v. 25, 26; Acts vii. 42, 43. Numb. xxi., "King Arad the Canaanite fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners." Ver. 5, Their souls loathe manna, fiery serpents are sent. Ver. 23, Sihon, king of the Amorites, comes out against them and fights. Ver. 33, Og, the king of Bashan, goes out against them. Chap. xxii., Balak sends Balaam to curse them. Chap. xxv., The people "commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab," and go "unto the sacrifices of their gods" at Baal-peor, upon which a plague ensues. Chap. xxxi., They war with Midian, slay their five kings, destroy their cities, women, children, flocks, thirty-two thousand women that had not known man they take captive. And in this war they lost not one man, ver. 49. Now our observations are:

Obs. 1. Man's wickedness strangely contrasts with God's goodness: God knew their sin and yet destroyed them not; they receive mercies and yet sin.

Obs. 2. It is a great mercy for God to know a man in time of distress. This is God's way. Men know in prosperity; but let us make God our friend, he will be a friend otherwise than men will be.

Obs. 3. We should not be dejected in times of trouble; that is the time for God to know thee: be willing to follow God in any estate.

Obs. 4. God's knowing us in distress is a mighty engagement. Let us look back to the times when we were in trouble.

Obs. 5. Let us know God's cause when it suffers, and know our brethren in their sufferings.

Obs. 6. God's knowledge is operative and working; it does us good. Our knowledge of God should be so too. To sin against our knowledge of God is evil, but to sin against God's knowledge of us is worse.

Ver. 6. According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me.

You heard in the preceding verse of the gracious providence of God towards his people while they were in the wilderness: "I did know thee in the wilderness, in the land of great drought." God glories much, and mentions often, his care over, and goodness to, his people in the wilderness: When they had got out of the wilderness into the land of Canaan, where there was much pasture, they thought themselves to be well, that now they could live of themselves; and so they lived to themselves, and in a little time destroyed themselves: the truth is, they were in a worse condition than when they were in the wilderness, for, saith he, "According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me. Therefore I will be unto them as a lion: as a leopard by the way will I observe them: I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps."

We do not hear such terrible things against them when they were in the wilderness.

"I did know thee in the wilderness," but now it is otherwise.

From the connexion note first,

Obs. 1. It is better to want the comforts of the creature, and to have God's protection, than to have abundance of the creature, and depend on ourselves. We do not love a dependent life, but it is safest; many have more of God's presence with them, and protection over them, when they are in the wilderness, when they are in adversity, than they have when they come into prosperity, when they come to enjoy abundance of the creature: God knows them when they are in afflictions, and they know God; but when they become prosperous, God neither knows them so much, nor they know God so much.

Examine, I beseech you, when you were low; say, had you not more of God's presence with you then than you have now? Did not God know you more then? did not you know God more then? had you not more sweet communion in those times than you have now? Oh, God made you know him by gracious visitations of his Spirit, and there were gracious workings of your spirit towards him. Are not you grown flat, dead, drossy, and carnal now more than before? do not you seek greedily after the world to fill yourselves therewith? and do not you begin to be exalted in your own hearts? do not you begin to be puffed up? have you no friends that are so? If you know but any of your friends that, when they were lower than they now are, knew God better than now they do, and God knew them, and there was more sweet converse between God and them, put them in mind of this text: "I did know thee in the wilderness, in the land of great drought. According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me." God deliver them from the remaining part of the text, "I will be unto them as a lion; as a leopard by the way;—as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps." You seldom find in Scripture any of God's saints worse for afflictions; give me any one example: for my part, I know not one in all the book of God that came worse out of an affliction than when they went in; but I can tell you of many, even of God's dear people, that came worse out of prosperity than when they came in. Therefore it is observable in 2 Chron. xvii. 3, it is said in commendation of Jehoshaphat, that he walked in "the first ways" of David his father. David his father at first was in an afflicted estate, afterwards in a more prosperous condition; he was hunted like a partridge at first, but when he came to prosperity his ways were not so good, therefore the Holy Ghost puts a commendation on his "first ways" rather than upon his after ways. I fear it may be said so of some, that their first ways, when they were low, were a great deal better than their after ways. This for the connexion.

"According to their pasture, so were they filled." According to the fatness and riches of the land when they came into it they were filled; they fell upon whatever sensual pleasure they could enjoy to the uttermost of their means. They would improve all the means and opportunities they had to give contentment to the flesh; "so were they filled." Thus you see men that love to live in the gratification of the flesh up to the height of their means, will be sure to have satisfaction if possible; if they go abroad and see any thing that may give content to the flesh, they resolve to have it if they can when they come home. According to all the means that they have, so they will have the flesh satisfied. How happy were men if they were so wise for their souls, if according to the means of grace we sought to fill our souls! Oh, how does the Lord lead us in green pastures, and yet what empty souls have we!

"According to their pasture, so were they filled." But can we say, that according to the green pastures in which God leads us, so are we filled? We live in green pastures, and yet are we empty. Here we see that men regard their bodies, regard the sensual pleasures of the flesh abundantly more than spiritual, as if there were a greater good in sensual delights than there is in all spiritual comforts.

"According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled." Twice we have "filled."

A little will serve man's desires in spiritual things, but they will fill, and fill themselves again, in things sensual.

It notes the greediness of their spirits in falling upon those contentments which they had for the flesh. When they came into a fertile land "they were filled; they were filled;" such is the nature of carnal men, to fall with greediness on creature-comforts, and to think on nothing but filling themselves, filling, filling. In Psal. lxxviii. 29, you may see what their disposition was; even before they came into their fat pastures, when God but in the wilderness granted them flesh, "they did eat," saith the text, "and were well filled." So it is in your books, but the force of the Hebrew is, they were filled very much, they were filled exceedingly, they filled themselves to the uttermost. Prov. xxiii. 5, well describes the greediness of men's hearts after carnal contentments; "Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not?" speaking of riches: thus it is in your books, "Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not?" but the more correct translation is, Wilt thou make thine eyes to fly upon that which is not? When a carnal heart sees any opportunity of enjoying carnal contentments, he makes his eyes to fly upon them, to fly upon them with eagerness: great is the greediness of a carnal heart!

"According to their pasture, so were they filled."

They thought of nothing but filling themselves, whereas other thoughts should have mingled with their self-gratification, when God brought them into their fat pastures. True, we may enjoy what God gives us; yea, but we must not only seek to fill ourselves, but we are to labour to mix such thoughts as these with the good things which we enjoy. As thus, now;

1. Here I enjoy abundance of good in the creature; whence have I all this? is it not from God? They did not think of this, so be it they might fill themselves. As the swine under the acorn tree seeks to fill the belly, but never looks from whence the acorns come; so carnal hearts fill themselves, but never look whence the blessings come; whereas a gracious heart takes the comforts of the creature that God affords, but, while it is receiving them, it looks up to God the principal of all.

2. What do I think God aims at? God gives me abundance of the creature, but what is God's end? is it only to satisfy my flesh? has God no further end than this?

3. I now possess these contentments, but what opportunities have I by these to do good more than before? Surely these are not given me merely to pamper the flesh, but are given me as large opportunities of service for God.

4. Now I enjoy abundance. What is the rule that God has set in the word for the ordering of my heart in the time of plenty?

5. I have much now in the world more than before; but oh my unworthiness! how unworthy am I of these comforts! unworthy of the least morsel of bread, and yet my table is furnished, and I am filled. Carnal hearts fall upon their dishes, and pour down their full cups, and never think of their unworthiness, how unworthy they are of the least drop of water.

6. God gives me abundance of the creature; but what is it that makes the difference between me and others? Some others are empty enough, their bellies are empty, their houses empty, their cupboards empty; but I am filled: why should God deal thus with me rather than with others?

7. I enjoy abundance here in the creature; but is there not danger, is there not a snare in the possession? Have not I a naughty, vile heart? How if these should prove to be temptations to me to draw my heart from God? were I not better without them? In the Epistle of Jude, ver. 12, it is spoken of as an evidence of carnality, that they feast, "feeding themselves without fear;" they fall upon what is before them and fill themselves, but "without fear:" whereas we should never enjoy fulness in the world, but with fear; fear of the snare that there may be in the abundance.

8. I have abundance; but what uncertainty is there in all these things! I have it now, but how quickly may it be gone; these things taken from me, or I from them!

9. I have much, and therefore I have a great account to give to God of these my pastures; this my fulness will make my account so much the greater.

10. I have much: oh, but, considering how little service I do for God, may not I fear that this which I have is to be my portion?

11. Do not many obligations attend on my possession? That fulness which I have, does it not more fully engage me unto God than others? Carnal hearts are void of these thoughts in the enjoyment of their fulness, they care not, so be it they can but fill themselves, how they get, or how they use their abundance.

O my brethren, our hearts should be filled with these thoughts in our fulness; but it is with most as in Isa. lvi. 12, "Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant:" there is all that they care for.

Those especially fall most greedily upon carnal contentments that have been kept short a long time. So it was here.

"I did know thee in the wilderness, in the land of great drought. According to their pasture, so were they filled." "They were filled," they minded nothing but filling themselves, they gormandized; as it is usual with them that have lived very sparingly and meanly before, if they come to a full diet they fill themselves so greedily, as even sometimes to distemper themselves, and occasion plagues and grievous diseases: when a man has fasted to starving almost, he had need be very careful what he does when he comes to a full table. Physicians will not suffer men that have fasted long to eat much: it brings many diseases on soldiers and others, because sometimes they want much, and sometimes they have abundance, and so they spoil themselves; as we read of Saul's men, that they fell upon the cattle so that they did eat the blood. Oh let us take heed of this; it should be a reasonable lesson to those who have known what emptiness has meant in these times, and are now going into their countries again, and to enjoy their possessions: oh let them take heed how they fall upon the comforts of the creature greedily; they should rather prepare themselves beforehand, and season their hearts with those thoughts, that may keep them from the danger of fulness. And when they come to their horses and lands, and begin to stock them again, they should think, Oh, what were those sins of mine when I was here before in my house, and enjoyed fulness! how little honour had God by my abundance before! Let me now remember all my murmurings and repinings when God took away my estate, and let me seek to make peace with God even for them. In the time of my distress, I cried to God, and

I was afraid that I should never enjoy my estate again; and has God given it to me? oh let me improve it better for his service than ever I have done. Such thoughts men should have when they come to their estates again, and not fall upon them as if they only sought to make up for interrupted pleasures, and thought of nothing else. There is a great deal of danger here. God has ways to make men cast out their sweet morsels when they regard nothing but the filling of themselves.

"And their heart was exalted."

This their fulness puffed them up: pride is a disease that ordinarily follows fulness. It is hard, saith Bernard, to be in honour without swelling. Pride is the disease of prosperity; so, Psal. lxxiii., David describes the prosperity of the wicked, and in ver. 6 adds, "Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment;" and hence that caveat of the apostle, 1 Tim. vi. 17, "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded." "Charge them," saith the apostle, for it is usual for men that are rich, that are full, to be high-minded. "Charge them, that they be not high-minded." Because,

Difficile est esse in honore sine timore, Bern.

1. That these things in the world are great things in their eyes, yea, they are the only good things to a carnal heart; they are his happiness, and therefore he blesses himself in them, and is puffed up on account of them.

2. When they enjoy fulness in the world, then their lusts are satisfied, then they have fuel for their lusts, which makes them grow mighty high.

3. They can live of themselves and depend upon none, and this essentially puffs them up. In Psal. x. 5, speaking of proud men in prosperity, the psalmist saith, "As for all his enemies, he puffeth at them." They care for nobody in the world, they can live of themselves; others depend upon them, and they depend upon none, and this elates them.

4. They conceive some excellency in themselves. Why, they have more than others; as if it were because they had more excellency in themselves, and were more worthy than others; they are not common people, but are called out from among others as the prime and chief, as if there were more worth in them: this puffs them up.

5. They see all desire what they have; they see a great distance between them and others, and those that are under them do highly esteem them. "They call the proud happy;" the rich have many flatterers. "They were filled, and their heart was exalted," not only above men, but above God. Psal. lxxiii. 9, "They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth." They will speak against every one when they are high themselves, scorning at the ways of God, and at his saints. When do wicked men that are of scornful spirits, scorn and speak most roughly against the people of God and his ways, but when they are filled? when at taverns they have filled themselves with wine and good cheer, then they scorn, and blaspheme, and "set their mouths against the heavens, and their tongues walk" throughout the city and country, against parliament, and all indiscriminately; their tongues are free when they are filled. Hence Psal. xxxv. 16, "With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth." In the time of their feasts, when they were filled, then they were "mockers," and "they gnashed upon me with their teeth." Abundance of evil is done by scorning and contemning at feasts; and in that respect their wine, with which they then fill themselves, may be called, as in Dent. xxxii. 33, "the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps;" for as it fills their bodies with heat, so their spirits with rage and malice. And especially those who were heretofore low, if they come to be filled, their hearts are most exalted. Oh the sad examples we have of this at this day! many not long since in a low and mean condition, having gotten places, they have got estates and power in their hands, oh how are their hearts exalted! Would you ever have thought to have lived to have seen such a change in their spirits as at this day? In how many ways do they discover their pride now they are promoted!

1. In their estrangement towards those that they were familiar with heretofore. They keep aloof from you; they are filled, and now their hearts are exalted.

2. Their carriage is very high and lofty; you must wait now if you would but speak to them.

3. Now they need no advice or counsel. They were wont to communicate themselves to you, and to be willing to hearken to advice and counsel; yea, but they are filled now, and their hearts are exalted, as if the exaltation of their estates put more wit into their heads.

4. Now they are harsh; to those that are under them they speak harshly and ruggedly, and care not for any under them. When they lived formerly among their neighbours, then they would complain of the harshness and rigidity of others, but since they are filled they are as harsh as any; and so before, when they were low, they cried out of oppression, but when they come once to be in place themselves, and to be filled, then they act as others: hence that in Psal. lxxiii. 8, "They speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily:" if you complain of oppression, they speak thus. It is spoken of wicked men in prosperity.

5. They show their pride. When they are filled they cannot bear contradiction now as they were wont, they cannot now endure reprehension.

6. Those mercies which not long since they would have highly prized, they now slight, they are now in their eyes as mean things.

7. All the use they make of what they enjoy now more than before, is to get higher and higher, for that alone they use it all. Those who have been low and mean in their estates, now they begin to be filled their hearts are exalted; and thus do they discover the exaltation of their hearts. Oh! but this is a great and a sore evil, for so it is rebuked by the prophet. O thou that hast thy heart exalted on being filled, it is a sign that thou hast a poor, low spirit of thine own, to be so lifted up with those things which thou dost enjoy.

For, 1. What low and mean things are they! What are they but crumbs that the Master of the family casts to dogs?

2. They are such things as make thee never a whit the better, nor the more excellent. Indeed it is said, that knowledge puffs up the heart, for it puts an excellency upon the man; but the heart of the wicked is little worth, let him have never so much prosperity.

3. Those things in which thou primest thyself, are no other than may be, and have been, the portion of a reprobate. They are no other than may, consist with God's eternal hatred of thee, and his eternal wrath against thee.

4. They are such things as may come from God's wrath, and like enough they do; and when thou art filled with, and thereby puffed up by them, it is a sign that there is a curse mixed with them. If a man comes to a table and eats, and then swells presently, God be merciful to me, am I poisoned? saith he. If thou fillest thyself, and art puffed up, it is an argument thy prosperity is poisoned, the curse of God is on it. Had not you rather have the coarsest diet, were it only wholesome, than the daintiest dish with poison in it? Is it not better to have the russet coat that is not dangerous, than a velvet coat that has the plague in it? Thy condition, if thou knowest it, may be was a great deal better before. Oh that any considerations might abate the elation of men's spirits, that are so puffed up with outward prosperity!

5. Thou art less filled with spiritual good than before; that which is substance thou hast lost, and thou art filled with wind.

6. Ere long what thou hast must be taken away.

7. Perhaps the right to what thou dost enjoy, is but the right that a malefactor has to his supper before the day of his execution.

8. The evil of any one sin is a greater evil than all thy prosperity is a good; if it but occasion any one sin to thee, it brings more evil upon thee than all the filling thou hast is good unto thee.

9. Thou art filled; but oftentimes it falls out so, that the very time for God to let out his wrath upon wicked men is when they are most filled. Job xx. 22 remarkably confirms this: "In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits:" it is an expression to be noted; they think they have sufficient now to live of themselves, but "in the fulness of their sufficiency they shall be in straits." And in ver. 23, "When he is about to fill his belly, God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him." And in Psal. lxxviii. 29—31, "So they did eat, and were well filled; for he gave them their own desire; they were not estranged from their lust. But while their meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them." Oh, thy fulness is no cause for thee to lift up thy heart, for when thou art fullest, then is the time for God's hottest wrath to be let out upon thee, thine abundance but prepares thee for slaughter. How much better is it for the beast to feed on the common and live, than to be brought into fat pasture and prepared for the butcher! When thou wert feeding on the common, thou wert in a way of preservation; but now thou art come into the fat pasture, it is to prepare thee for slaughter: be not exalted then in thine own heart because of thy fulness.

10. It may be God has respect to others in thy fulness, it is not in regard to thee.

11. Hereafter thou mayst perhaps curse the time that ever such an estate befell thee, curse the time of thy fulness. Perhaps upon thy sick bed thou mayst lie and wish, Oh that I had kept my shop still, and been continued in my low condition! I had gone out of the world with a great deal less guiltiness than now I am like to appear before God with. Oh, be not exalted because thou art full.

"Therefore have they forgotten me." Proud men forget God; "The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God," Psal. x. 4. They have forgotten what need they had once of me, what cries they sent up to me, what moans they made before me; they have forgotten how gloriously I wrought for their deliverance, and all their consequent engagements to me; they have forgotten to acknowledge me, or sanctify my name, in all the good they enjoy. Oh, this is a sore and great, and yet an ordinary, evil; as soon as we have our turns served, God is minded no more. "They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy," Psal. lxxviii. 42. Oh, it should have been in their memory, to have sanctified the name of God in their great deliverance; but when they were delivered they remembered it not. "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me," saith God. We call upon God in the time of trouble, and God hears us, and delivers us, but the latter part is forgotten; and that soon too; "They soon forgot his works," saith Psal. cvi. 13: sometimes we forget before the work is quite accomplished. Oh! the Lord deliver us from this great evil. Shall I say, Deliver us? I may say, not deliver us from this evil only, but out of it, for it is upon us already. Oh the great things that God has done for this land within these six years! Never, since Joshua's or Moses's time, was there a story of God's working for a people so wonderful as the story of this last six years would be if faithfully recorded; and yet, though the Lord be going on in his ways of mercy towards us, we have forgotten. Oh, does it not appear so? What do men look after? Every man his own advantage and ends, seeking to fill themselves, minding nothing else. And what mighty haughtiness of spirit is there in many men within this six years! Oh how have we forgotten the Lord, forgotten those instruments that God has made use of for good to us! God had more honour from us when there was not the hundredth part done for us; now we (as it were) shake our ears, and, let God do as he will, we hope we can contrive to shift pretty well for ourselves. Oh! the Lord deliver this city out of, and from, this evil of forgetting the Lord when we are filled. Your trading is becoming more abundant now than formerly; now the country begins to be open, and they repair to the city for all. Oh, the Lord deliver this city from surfeiting by their fulness, and from this sin of forgetting the Lord. Oh that we could but say, That the Lord having restored the trading to the city, and that in a measure exceeding former experience, that we are resolved to sanctify the name of God more than ever we did. Oh! do you remember God every time you see customers come into your shops, every time you see the waggons come out of the country into your streets, do you bless God? and how is he therefore honoured among you? Oh that it were so! It is a sore and grievous evil to forget the Lord, after he has granted us fulness; it is a horrible ingratitude, as if there were nothing to be regarded but ourselves. And especially dangerous, because,

1. It is against many previous warnings of God. If you read Deut. vi. 10—12, and viii. 10—20, you shall find there how the Lord charges his people: "When the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land, when thou shalt have eaten and be full, then beware lest thou forget the Lord," "Then beware lest thou forget:" again and again this is inculcated, showing how prone we are to forget the Lord in our fulness. Oh that you, whom Providence has brought here this morning, would consider these scriptures! Now God is beginning to come in with more fulness than before; O, beware that you forget not the Lord God in the midst of your fulness; let there be as much or more prayer in your family than there was in former times, that you may have a sanctified use of the fulness which you now enjoy. Yea, to forget is worse than beastly. "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." If the ox be but fed, he knows his owner. Who is it that feeds you? Is it not the Lord? and will you forget him? Oh! this will lose the blessing of all you enjoy, and your hearts will grow wicked beyond what you can imagine; you cannot imagine the evil that your hearts will grow to, if you forget God in the enjoyment of that estate in which God sets you.

2. It is a sin that God knows not how to pardon. For so he expresses himself, Jer. v. 7, "How shall I pardon thee for this!" As if he should say, Though I be a God of infinite mercy, yet here is a sin I know not how to pardon. Why, saith he, when I had fed them to the full, they committed adultery, and they abused that fulness. Oh! "how shall I pardon thee for this?"

3. If ever you have need of God again, how will conscience be stopped? With what face could you go to God again for help, if brought low? conscience will presently say, You were once empty and God filled you, and what honour had God from you? No, your hearts were exalted, and you forgot God.

4. To forget the Giver in the enjoyment of his gifts, is most foolish. We depend upon God in the midst of all our fulness as much as before, every moment we lie at God's mercy; though perhaps you are not sensible of it, yet certainly it is so.

5. Your forgetting God will make you forget yourselves; and just it may be with God to forget you, and to change the course of his administration towards you. Oh! take heed then of being exalted, and of forgetting the Lord, in your fulness.

Truly, brethren, God had rather have his people fall into almost any sin than pride, and consequent forgetfulness of him. Therefore you find in Scripture, that God will rather set the devil upon his people, than have their hearts exalted. As Paul, lest he should be lifted up above measure, he had a thorn in the flesh, the buffeting of Satan. God had rather see the devil buffet his people than see their hearts exalted.

Yea, he had rather suffer them to fall into any other sin. Charge your souls, then, against this, as David; "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name; bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits," Psal. ciii. 1, 2. See what a charge he puts upon his soul; "O my soul," thou hast received many benefits from the Lord, and there is this deadness in thee; if but left to thyself, thou wilt forget the Lord, and this will be a sore evil in thee; "bless, then, the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits." Oh that you would go home and charge your souls not to forget the Lord and all his benefits! let husband put wife in mind with this charge, and wife the husband, but especially yourselves in secret, between God and yourselves, to charge your souls not to forget his benefits. On the contrary, the more we remember God in our blessings they will be,

1. The more sweet to us. You have a great many mercies, but when you forget God you lose the very sweetness of all your mercies. Oh! when you can see a mercy, and see the God of that mercy, then it is sweet: when I can see a mercy, and the fountain from whence it comes, and whither it tends, then the mercy is sweet: oh! therefore you deal foolishly in forgetting the Lord.

2. The more safe.

3. The more eminent will we be in grace. Oh what a lovely object is it to behold a man or woman heavenly and spiritual in the midst of all outward enjoyments! I say, the graces of such do indeed glister like diamonds, like most precious pearls; and therefore, remember the Lord in all the good things that you enjoy.

Ver. 7. Therefore I will be unto them as a lion: as a leopard by the way will I observe them.

Most dreadful expressions follow here. God is exceedingly provoked with the exaltation of men's hearts, and their forgetfulness of him in prosperity.

Is this the same God that spake so of Ephraim heretofore? "Is Ephraim my dear son?" Ephraim "my pleasant child." "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" "mine heart is turned within me;" "ever since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still," and "my repentings are kindled together." Is this the Lord that now will be "as a lion," "a leopard," "a bear bereaved of her whelps," "a wild beast," unto Ephraim? What! is this the God that heretofore carried them as eagles do their young upon their wings, and nourished them as the eagle nourisheth her young ones? Is this the God that was as a gracious father unto them, to whom this people were as "the dearly beloved of God's soul;" and now God "a lion," "a leopard," "a bear bereaved of her whelps," "a wild beast to tear them?" Is this the merciful God? Is it thus that God appears who is love and mercy itself? O my brethren, how dreadful does sin render God to his creature! But all this while there is no change in God's heart; God is the same in himself as before; the change is in the creature. The sun that softens the wax, the same sun hardens the clay. The same blessed, infinite, glorious Being, that does good to his creature in one condition, is in another aspect dreadful to the creature. "With an upright man thou wilt show thyself upright, and with the froward thou wilt show thyself froward," Psal. xviii. 25, 26. Above all, God sets himself out in a most terrible manner against those whose hearts in prosperity were exalted and forgot him.

Obs. 1. The Lord pities men, yea, sinful men, in the time of their adversity; but when they are at the height, and forget him, his anger is especially hot against them. I will cite one passage to show how God has regard to men in low conditions; but against those that are fattened up in prosperity, his anger burns most fiercely. Ezek. xxxiv. 16, "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick: but I will destroy the fat and the strong; I will feed them with judgment." "That which was lost," "I will seek;" "that which was broken," "I will bind up;" "that which was sick," "I will heal;" but "I will destroy the fat and the strong; I will feed them with judgment." Here surely is a scripture full of comfort for the hearts of those that are in an afflicted condition. See how God regards such; but God has not such regard to "the fat and the strong;" he "will feed them with judgment," and destroy them. The care and protection of God is more over the lost ones, and the broken ones, and the sick ones, than the fat ones and the strong ones; they are to be fed with judgment. "I will be to them as a lion;" and the reasons of this are,

1. Their hearts are very much hardened in their sin, their sin is grown to a height.

2. There are so many creatures that they have use of more than others, that do cry against them. Poor people have not so many creatures to cry against them as the rich have.

3. They can make friends to avoid the stroke of justice from men, but the poor fall under it unpitied; therefore God takes them into his hands and deals with them more severely.

4. When judgment comes upon them it is more observed, and therefore God to them will be "as a lion."

"As a lion." You have a parallel passage in Psal. l. 22, "Consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver." Their hearts were exalted, they forgot God, "therefore I will be unto them as a lion."

1. A lion is the most terrible creature. "The lion hath roared, who will not fear?" Amos iii. 8. O my brethren, the threats of God should be to us as the roaring of a lion, and our hearts should tremble at them.

2. None can take away the prey from a lion. "As a young lion among the flocks of sheep; who, if he go through, both treadeth down, and teareth in pieces, and none can deliver," Micah v. 8. None can deliver out of God's hand.

3. A lion is strong, and crushes at once the whole compages of a man's bones. Alas! man, what is he? In Job iv. 19, he is said to be "crushed before the moth;" much more then before a lion: oh, then, much more before the Lord God when he comes as a lion!

4. The lion will narrowly mark any one that wounds her. If there were hundreds of men together, and one did but shoot at or wound her, she will be sure to mark that man. The Lord marks out those that sin against him, and that wound his name; they must not think to escape among others. The Lord's eye is upon them particularly.

5. The lion sleeps but little, and with her eyes open. So the Lord. As "he that keepeth Israel neither slumbereth nor sleepeth," Psal. cxxi. 4; so he that destroys his enemies does not slumber nor sleep.

6. The lion will fall upon no creature except from hunger or provocation. The Lord, though his wrath be terrible as a lion, yet is not so ready to fall upon his creature; it must be for some special end, or from some provocation, but then he falls terribly indeed.

7. It is observed of the lion, that if you do but fall down on the ground, and submit and yield, it will pass by, and will not tear and rend where there is a humble submission, whereas other creatures will. Oh! thus God is a lion, terrible, but yet only to those that stand out against him.

8. The naturalists observe of the lion, that it cannot endure to be looked asquint upon by any. Thus it is with the Lord; the Lord loves no squint-eyed Christians, I mean, none that have by-ends of their own: the Lord loves uprightness in our ways and dealings.

9. They say of the lion, that it is a great enemy to apes and wolves. So is God to flatterers and tyrants. Thus God is compared to a lion.

"As a leopard by the way will I observe them." כנבר ער-לררר אשר The Seventy render this κατά τρυφὴν ὄσεν Ἀσσυρίων, by the way of the Assyrian: so the Vulgate and Jerome.

The she-leopard is the same as that which they call a panther; and the Lord compares himself to it, because,

1. It is so fierce, that it presently flies in the face of a man. "As a leopard," I will fly in the very faces of such; I will manifest much pride in their faces, and I will fly in their very faces, saith God.

2. It is a very swift creature, Hab. i. 8. So the Lord will swiftly come against wicked and ungodly men, "as a leopard," swiftly, and overtake them.

3. A leopard watches its prey, being very subtle, to observe the fit times and opportunities to fall upon the prey. So the text, "As a leopard by the way will I observe them:" this strongly intimates the fearful wrath of God against wicked men. As in Jer. v. 6, "A leopard shall watch over their cities." I say there is much of God's wrath in this, it is very terrible; the Lord sets his infinite wisdom on work to watch fit times and opportunities to let out his wrath upon ungodly men. "I will watch over them for evil," as in another scripture is threatened. Those are truly in a sad condition whom the Lord watches over for evil: God watches over his people for good; but such as, when they are full, exalt themselves and forget the Lord, God watches over them for evil: they should be destroyed soon; But, saith God, I have a fitter time than now, wherein I will both get myself a greater name, and it shall be worse for them; in due time shall their feet slide. This is the reason why men live so long in their prosperity, and go on and satisfy their wills, because God is watching over them, and his time is not yet come.

4. When the leopard comes upon its prey, it leaps upon it suddenly. And so does the Lord to ungodly men; he comes in an hour that they expect not, and leaps upon them. And therefore you must not think that you are as well, because you are in as safe a condition, as you were a year or seven years since. It is as well with me, saith one, as it has been with me in all my life-time. What then? you may be never a whit the further off from dangers, for the way of God in bringing his wrath is many times sudden.

5. The leopard sometimes will sleep a very long time, even three days together, but after it awakes it is more fierce than before. And so the Lord, though sometimes he may be patient towards sinners, yet, when he comes to awake out of his sleep, he is more terrible:

"Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep. And he smote his enemies in the hinder part: he put them to a perpetual reproach," Psal. lxxviii. 65, 66.

Ver. 8. I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps, and will rend the caul of their heart, and there will I devour them like a lion: the wild beast shall tear them.

The third creature is the bear: "I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps."

This creature is very fierce and terrible; accordingly we read in 2 Kings ii. 24, "There came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them." "Let a bear robbed of her whelps meet a man, rather than a fool in his folly," Prov. xvii. 12. She is fierce at all times, but above all, if she be "robbed of her whelps." It is observed that no creature loves her young ones more than the bear, and yet they are the most deformed of any; an emblem, it may be, of a man that loves his own deformed fancies. One interpreter remarks upon it: Oh, how will the Lord be in a holy rage, if his children be wronged, his own children, who bear his image; when the instinct of nature in this creature, the bear, incites it to such rage when she is robbed of such ugly things as her whelps are! 2 Sam. xvii. 8, saith Hushai to Absalom, "Thou knowest thy thy father and his men, that they be mighty men, and they be chafed in their minds, as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field." Thus the Scripture often compares exceeding fierceness and rage, to the fierceness of "a bear that is bereaved of her whelps;" therefore it is added here,

"And will rend the caul of their heart, and there will I devour them like a lion." Here he mentions the lion the second time. The word in your books is the same, but in the original it is somewhat different.

As the lion is named here the second time, we may observe, that when it comes on its prey it rends the body asunder, and loves to suck the blood and the fat that is about the heart; and as for the other parts, except in extreme hunger, it leaves them for other beasts to prey upon; but the heart, and the blood, and the fat about the heart, the lion loves to suck. And therefore saith God here, "I will rend the caul of their heart, and there will I devour them like a lion."

Luther well observes on this, The Lord here will do as a lion does, he more immediately will strike out their hearts, and punish them with spiritual plagues and judgments; and as for their estates and bodies, he will leave them to other beasts, and they shall plague them and punish them that way: they had a film upon their hearts, and instructions could not reach them; but God will tear that caul, will tear that film from off their hearts that kept off instructions. Oh! let us take heed of this that keeps out of our hearts the word of God, take heed of that for ever, for God has ways to tear this film from off thy heart.

As Bernard, putting his finger on his brother's side, who was a soldier, and disregarded his good instructions and admonitions, said, One day a spear shall make way to this heart for instructions and admonitions to enter: so I may say to such whose hearts have a film upon them, that what the preacher saith cannot find entrance, God may justly come and rend this caul from off thy heart that keeps out the admonitions of his word. Arias Montanus notes, that it may refer to the sending the plague upon their hearts, and leaving their estates and comforts to the Assyrians.

"The wild beast shall tear them." Why, did he not name wild beasts enough before? There was "the lion," and "the leopard," and "the bear," and "the lion" again, and yet he adds, "the wild beast;" as if he should say, If there be any terror, any dreadfulness, in any wild beasts whatsoever, there is that in my wrath, if you escape one wild beast another shall tear you; and now he comes to all wild beasts; put them all together, and such is the fierceness of my wrath. There arises from hence one excellent observation:

Obs. All the dreadfulness of all creatures in the world combined meets in the wrath of God. As all the good that is in all creatures together is in the love and mercy of God; so all things that can in any way bring any torment on, or torture to us, and the quintessence of all this is in God's wrath: "The wild beast shall tear them."

Lyra thinks that this prophecy was fulfilled when they were carried captive, and in their journey many died, and so they were cast into fields and devoured by wild beasts: and it is likely it may be fulfilled in part so; as usually, when soldiers carry an enemy captive, they throw them, if they be sick unto death, with little concern into a ditch, that is all they care for them. And so it was with this people; the Lord, though he knew them in the wilderness, and his protection was over them, yet now forgets them, and lets them be carried into captivity, and cast to wild beasts to tear and devour.

Some think that the expression of God's wrath by these beasts, has reference to the four monarchies, which God would make use of to be very terrible to his saints. In Dan. vii. you find the four monarchies of the world, the Babylonian, the Persian, the Grecian, and Roman monarchies, set forth in the same manner, as here the Holy Ghost sets out the wrath of God against Israel; for the truth is, those things that we have here in Hosea were to set forth God's ways to his people in after-times, and not merely when they were to be carried captive. In Dan. vii. 3, there appeared four great beasts; the first like a lion, by which was signified the Babylonish empire; the second like a bear, the Persian; the third like a leopard, the Grecian; for Alexander was as a leopard, exceeding swift, all his exploits he performed in twelve years, and was but thirty-three years old when he died. Moreover, they observe of the leopard, (which is named from a panther,) that its body smells exceeding sweet above all beasts; of Alexander's body, too, it was said, that it had a peculiarly sweet smell. Then the fourth being the Roman empire, mark how it is imaged, just as God here sets out his wrath; he names not any particular beast, but describes it as "dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it; and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns." You know now that that was divided into ten kingdoms, or ten sorts of civil governments at several times.

This is the Roman empire, the power of which antichrist was to have; by both which the Lord would exercise his people, and be very terrible to his people, especially those people of his that were apostatizing people, that would worship him according to their own ways: God would be thus terrible to them wherever they lived; under any of the former empires, they should have God either as a lion, a leopard, a bear, or like this last-mentioned dreadful creature.

But you will say, Why do you speak thus? Or it may be people would speak thus to the prophet, O, why do you speak of God in this terrible manner? Is not our God a gracious and a merciful God? why then will you render God thus terrible? In answer the prophet saith:

Panthera, hinc leopardus. Arist.
Histor. Animal.
lib. 9. cap. 6.

Slejd. de quat.
Imperis. lib. 3.

Ver. 9. O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help.

O, do not find fault with the dreadfulness of God, that God appears thus clothed in terrors to you; and do not blame the ministers of God, that they represent God in this dreadful manner before you. Though it is true, that God appears ready to destroy you, yet still the Lord is infinite, holy, and blessed, and a God of mercy and goodness in himself: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself," thou mayst thank thyself for all this. Many of you, when you hear the terrors of God set before you, perhaps your hearts rise against them, and your spirits exceedingly loathe such manifestations. Why then do ministers make God appear so terrible, when he is such a merciful and gracious God? O, rather lay thy hand upon thine own heart and say, God indeed is thus gracious and merciful, but it is my wickedness arrays God in terrors. The judgments of God are called "strange things," because God delights not in the execution of wrath, in appearing like "a lion," "a leopard," and "a bear." That which pleases the heart of God, is to appear as a Father to do good to his people; but, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself."

Obs. 1. This will one day aggravate men's judgments, that they are themselves the cause of all the evils which they suffer. You may think to put it over on God, and say, Oh how dreadful is God's justice! but God knows how to put it all upon yourselves. The destruction of sinners will appear to be from themselves; God will clear it up to all the world, before men and angels, and will clear it up to men's own consciences: the damned in hell shall not be able to speak against God's justice at all, but shall be forced to charge themselves with all the evil that is upon them: Oh! it was through this wretched, vile, and wicked heart of mine; God was not wanting to me in any means of good, but I had a rebellious heart, and I have brought all this evil upon myself; I have destroyed myself.

"O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." Destroyed himself! did not God, in the words immediately before, say, that he would "meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps," and "rend the caul of their heart," that he would be as "a lion" to them, and as "a leopard?" and yet here he saith, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself!"

Obs. 2. Though God makes use of instruments to execute severe wrath on a people, yet their destruction is to be attributed to themselves. "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself," thou mayst thank thyself for all this.

The original שָׂרַף יִשְׂרָאֵל is by some rendered differently; by Calvin and many others, It has destroyed thee, Israel.

The old English translation, wherein Beza's (the Geneva) notes are, renders it, one has destroyed them; the word may be so translated; one has destroyed them, or, it has destroyed them, or, somewhat has destroyed them; as if God should say, Not I, but somewhat else has destroyed them.

Tremelius translates it, thy king has destroyed thee; for so the context will bear. "Has destroyed us" (so are the words.) Iias? what has? Why your king has destroyed you, saith Tremelius. Most of the Hebrews complete it thus, your calf has destroyed you, your idols have destroyed you.

Aben Ezra, your feigned comforts have destroyed you. Drusus reads it interrogatively, Who has destroyed thee? Your fulness, of which ver. 6, or your own heart and wickedness, have destroyed you. The Greek thus, Τῆ διαφθορῆ τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ τίς βοηθήσει, Who shall give help to the corruption of Israel? Though the words be read so diversely, yet most agree in giving them the same meaning as your books; your own wickedness has destroyed you; your sinful, ungodly, idolatrous living, forsaking God and his ways, and putting confidence in an arm of flesh, that has destroyed thee.

"But in me is thine help." Those words are somewhat different in the original, for there are two ins, בְּיָדִי בְּיָדִי in me, in thy help. And so you may observe, that in your Bibles it is printed in a different character, which notes that it is not directly according to the original. In me, in thy help.

Drusus on the text saith, In me, in thy help; that is, I am in thy help, and thy help is in me. This seems to be according to the intention of the Holy Ghost, Whatsoever help thou hast, I am in it, and thy help it is in me. "In me is thine help."

Pareus reads it, against thy help, and so supplies the word, thou hast rebelled against thy help. Thou hast destroyed thy help; why? because thou hast rebelled against thy help. The original will bear this, against thy help.

But the other more full and general interpretation, and more in accordance with the original, is, thy help is wholly in me, and I am wholly in thy help; thou hast destroyed thyself, but thy help is wholly in me. This shall suffice for the reading of the words. Now for the several truths that are to be here held forth to us out of them.

Obs. 2. Men would fain put off their evils from themselves to God. Men are naturally loth to charge themselves with the evil that comes upon them, it is their ill hap, their ill fortune, their ill luck; or they could not help it, they did what they could; and so think to attribute it all to God; it is for want of means, for want of this or that thing which God denied to them, it is because God put them into such and such a condition; but never come to charge themselves. But the prophet speaks here in a compassionate way; O Israel, (saith he,) never stand charging it upon God, "thou hast destroyed thyself."

Obs. 3. God knows how to turn all the evil upon ourselves. Though we may think to lessen our evil by putting it upon God, God will turn it all upon our own heads, and make it clear to all the world that we were the cause of all the evils that were upon us, both temporal evils, and those evils that shall come upon such as shall perish eternally. It will be one of the great works at the day of judgment, to make it manifest to men and angels, that all the misery that comes upon the damned is from themselves; their own consciences will acknowledge it, and God will be justified before all: it will be found that the cause of man's perdition is not in the decree of God; God's decree damns none; their sin damns them, not the decree. For,

1. The decree of reprobation is but the leaving men to be dealt with in a way of justice. Whereas saith God, Here are some upon whom I am resolved to magnify my grace to all eternity, whatsoever comes between to hinder it, I am resolved that these shall be subjects for me to exercise my grace on to all eternity; that is election: but there are others whom I will leave to a way and course of justice, they shall have what they earn, and no otherwise. So that the decree is not the cause of men's damnation; their sin comes in between that and their damnation, so that they destroy themselves.

2. It infuses not any evil into them. You will say, Sin comes in between decree and damnation; but how comes sin in? Certainly not by any infusion from God, but by man himself, man himself is its author.

3. It is not by any coercion. You will say, Though sin in men is the cause of it, yet men cannot help it, men cannot but sin. Now to reply: 1. Man sins as freely as if he could do otherwise. God made man in Ego in auxilio tuo, et auxilium tuum est in me. Drus.

Quod in me in auxiliatorem rebelasti. Pareus.

Predidit te, Israel. Calv.

Predidit te rex tuus. Trem.

Vitulus tuus. Rabh.

Canaliculus fictitia. Ab. Ezz. Corrupte te. Drus.

such a condition that he might not have sinned; and though it is now true that, through their fall, men cannot do that which is good, they cannot but sin, "having eyes full of adultery and that cannot cease from sin," as the apostle saith of some, yet they sin as freely as if they had power to keep from sin; sin pleases their wills, it is suitable to them: so it is true that the saints in heaven cannot but glorify God, but yet they glorify God with freedom too; they are so set in an estate of glory, that they cannot sin, but yet they honour God freely, that is, in honouring God they do that which is suitable to their own spirits. 2. Every sinner that perishes, murders himself. All that are damned eternally, all of them are self-murderers: this is a grievous thing: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself." The more there is of self in men's destruction, the more grievous is their condition. It would make our hearts bleed to see a bird shot with an arrow feathered from its own body: all the judgments of God, all the arrows of the Almighty, that come against sinners, are as it were feathered by that which comes from sinners themselves, they are the cause of their own evils. The more self in sinners' destruction, the more hard is their condition. Self appears in sin,

1. When men bring misery upon themselves without any temptation. The less temptation, the more self: and some destroy themselves so, that it comes merely from themselves without any temptation.

2. When men's sins are plotted, contrived sins. The more plotting and contriving about sin, the more art thou the author of thine own evil or destruction.

3. When men sin, although warned beforehand of their sin. They are told beforehand of the evil, yet still are wilful in it, and will go on in it: such may thank themselves for their destruction.

4. When men, notwithstanding they are often stopped in their sin, and though God many times in the dispensations of his providence, and by his word, stays them in their course of sin, and yet still they will go on. Thank thyself if thou be undone.

5. The more means to the contrary they enjoy, the more enlightenings, the more drawings of the Holy Ghost to win them from their sin, and yet unavailingly.

6. When men's sins are of that nature, that they do not only deserve, but they actually work, their destruction. All sins deserve it, but some sins work it; as drunkenness, and some others which might be named; the very sin there destroys the sinner.

7. When men shall presume to venture further in any danger than they can help themselves out of. They think they will go but thus far, and no farther, and so they venture on beyond their power to help themselves; they destroy themselves.

Now this evil of self-destruction is so much the more grievous, when men destroy themselves in things in which they most bless themselves, in which they do most glory, and in which they promise to themselves the greatest good; if this proves to be their destruction, it is so much the more grievous. Oh, it is a sad thing to be a self-destroyer; for,

1. What pity can there be for such? Who will pity any who are the cause of all their own evil, who wilfully bring it upon themselves? You will say, Thank yourselves; who will pity you? Oh, this will be the condition of all that perish; neither God, nor angels, nor saints shall pity them; neither the father out of whose loins they came, nor the mother who bare them; they shall see that they have undone themselves.

2. The extreme vexation that there will be in men's spirits when they shall be convinced of this, when the Lord shall present to them all the means they have had, and all the mercies they have enjoyed, so that their consciences shall fly in their faces and tell them, You may thank yourselves for this, it was that wretched heart of thine that thou hast so talked of; I told you of this before; that pride, that hypocrisy, that self-seeking, and that falseness of thine, have brought thee to all this. Oh this will be an eternal vexation, it will be the matter for the worm to gnaw upon in hell hereafter, Oh, we have destroyed ourselves!

3. God will revenge this upon men; for no man has the power over himself; thou destroyest one of God's creatures in being a self-murderer, thou shalt be punished for destroying thyself. Because they have not the disposal of themselves, they are God's creatures. It is a greater sin for a man to murder himself, than his father or mother. Austin was wont to say, It is a greater sin than parricide, to be a self-murderer; and the reason he gives is, For the nearer the relation, the greater is the sin of the murder: as it is a greater sin for me to murder a kinsman than a stranger, a greater sin to murder a brother than a kinsman more remote, a greater sin to murder a father than a brother, so it is a greater sin for me to murder myself than my father; why? for I am nearer myself than my father: and so the sin is greater for any to lay violent hands upon themselves than upon another. You would think it a horrid thing if the devil were to come with a temptation, Go, take a halter and hang up your mother that bore you, or take a knife and cut your father's throat; but when you are tempted to murder yourselves the sin is still greater. Self-murder is a great evil, and yet all people in the world that perish are self-murderers. When we do but hear of a man that hangs or drowns himself, we think it is a very sad thing: now when you look upon wicked men going on in the ways of sin and destruction, look upon them as so many men running to drown themselves, and plunge themselves into the bottomless gulf; as so many men cutting their own throats, and hanging themselves, for so they assuredly do. Hence let us learn,

1. To charge ourselves with all the evil that is upon us. Do not so put it off, neither on God nor the devil, but charge ourselves still, for certainly we cause more evil to ourselves than all the devils in hell. All the devils in hell could not undo us, if we did not undo ourselves. We are ready to charge it upon wicked men, or temptations of the devil; and if not so, then upon God; for so you do, when any thinks to excuse his sin thus, God knows I do what I can: that is as much as if you should say, For my part, I am free of any evil that comes upon me, if I perish I am guiltless; I do what I can, and it is because God does not give me grace: thus you put it from yourselves on God. No, let us learn to charge ourselves with evil: a tender heart will take even that which is the devil's to himself, and a carnal heart will put over that which is from himself on the devil. Observe the difference between one that has a tender spirit, and another; when any temptation originating really with the devil comes, he presently charges his own heart, Oh what a wretched, vile heart have I! whereas it may be but mere suggestions and temptations of the devil, and not the steam and filth of his heart; but he judges his heart from those temptations, and thinks it is nothing but its uncleanness and filthiness. But you shall have another man that has a most filthy, wicked heart, and there come most abominable steams which break forth into foul diseases, and though it comes altogether from himself, yet saith he, The temptations of the devil lead me aside, and I cannot tell how to resist him. It is not from temptations, it is from thyself, from that wicked, unclean heart of thine; and were there no devils in hell at all, thou hast the seeds of all sin in thy heart, thine own uncleanness is their fruitful source.

2. To be afraid of ourselves, and to pray to God to be delivered from ourselves. Better to be given up to the devil than to one's self. You know the incestuous person was delivered up to Satan, but it was for the destruction of the flesh, and the saving of his soul, 1 Cor. v.; but when one is given up to himself, it is for the damning of his soul: then we may well say by anticipation of the lost, "Thou hast destroyed thyself."

And, my brethren, we have cause to think of this very seriously likewise in respect of the kingdom and nation. Certainly, if ever this kingdom be destroyed, it must needs be written for the generations to come, Here is a kingdom that has destroyed itself. Certainly we cannot say it is from God, if we perish: what God will do with us we know not, but truly, this we may plainly see, that if God leaves us but a little more to ourselves, we are in a very fair way to destroy ourselves; and that after all that God has wrought for us. God has wrought like a God for us; but we, how do we deal for ourselves? Like men, shall we say? Oh no, like brute beasts: if men, mad-men, men that are appointed to destruction. It will be the saddest story that ever was in the world against a people, if so be that at length we perish, after God has done so much for us. Truly, now God has wrought like a God to deliver us from our common enemies, God has need to work as much for us like a God to deliver us from ourselves. Great have the works of God been in delivering us from the rage of those of whom we thought, and that justly, that they intended our destruction. If God should now say, Well, I have done my work, I have delivered you from those you were afraid of, and now I will leave you to yourselves, oh! we had cause to fall upon our faces, and say, O Lord, do not so, for it had been better that they had destroyed us; for if thou shouldst leave us to ourselves, our destruction would be a more bitter destruction. Do not we see how fast we run towards destruction? being but a little left to ourselves, what a perverse spirit is there now amongst us! We say sometimes of the prelates, The hand of God is against them; how have they brought themselves into a snare! Now they may stand and look upon us, and even laugh almost at us, and say, Well, let them alone; as we speak of some, Give them line enough and they will quickly hang themselves; Let them alone, and they will fall out one with another, and destroy one another, they will quickly ruin themselves if they be let alone. Oh, we have as much experience as any of the vanity of men's hearts, of their folly, pride, hypocrisy, and frowardness. Who could ever have thought this five or six years ago? If this had been presented as it were in a map to us, You shall be in great dangers, you shall have mighty enemies rise ready to swallow you up; but I will appear and work for you, I will put forth my glory, the right hand of my power and excellency shall appear for you; and when all this is done, you shall undo yourselves, and out of your own selves shall be your ruin, even from those in whom you much trusted, and much applauded, even they shall be cause of the evil; yea, and you who now think your hearts are so right, and have said, Oh, if God would but deliver us, how we would magnify his name! you yourselves shall be the cause of the evil of the kingdom. Had any said so of some of whom now our hearts have cause to shake within us, when we think, (as the prophet did of Hazael,) You shall do thus and thus, they would have been ready to answer, What! are we dogs? are we dead dogs, that we should do such things? Well, the Lord deliver us from ourselves.

"But in me is thine help."

We can easily destroy ourselves, but can we save ourselves? A child can break a glass that all the men in the country cannot mend. Every fool may do mischief to himself, yea, and to others, but can he help? It is God only that is the help of his people; it is not means that help, but God; yea, God much glories in that very thing, to be accounted the cause of all good; he would have all evil cast upon men, but all good from himself, even present good, and eternal good, he would have attributed to himself.

One, though a Jesuit, comments thus on these words, "In me is thine help." Hence it follows, (saith he,) that predestination, vocation, and grace, do not come from the foresight of the merits of those that are predestinated, but from God's predestinating, calling, preventing with his grace: these things are the help of God. Even from the mouth of a Jesuit we have this thus acknowledging sometimes in their writings, and when they are serious, that neither predestination, nor vocation, nor grace, comes from any foresight of what man would do, but only from God's predestinating, calling, preventing the predestinated by his grace; and this is the help of God. God is the centre of all good, both present and eternal.

Austin was wont to say, God does many good things in a man that a man does not himself; man does nothing which God does not that man may do. This point we must not speak at large to, but pass by presently, for we met with it before in the prophecy, where it was said, "There is no saviour beside me," chap. xiii. 4.

"In me is thine help." That is, thy continued help; not only help for the present, but whatsoever help thou hast continued to thee, it is all in God. "Be thou their arm every morning, our salvation also in the time of trouble," Isa. xxxiii. 2; not only their help for the present, but they need still a continued supply and help every morning. We may here, further,

Obs. 4. There is no misery that man can bring himself to in this world, but there is help for it in God. Though thou hast destroyed thyself, yet in me is thy help; there may yet be help in God. As if God should say, I do glory in being a helper. It is God's glory to help men in misery; let it be ours.

It is the glory of many men to destroy, to do mischief; but it is the glory of God to be a helper.

Luther, on the place, saith, I desire to defend thee, to preserve thee, this indeed is to be a God. To be a helper, God glories in this. Oh that we could account it our glory to be helpful to one another!

Let us also look upon God in this his glory, and make him the object of our faith in times of distress. Let us not lie vexing and fretting under our misery, but lift up our eyes to God the Helper. Let no want of means, no unworthiness in us, cause our hearts to sink: those despairing temptations that say to us, There is no help in God, they are very sinful at any time, let the condition be never so bad.

You will say, I am a wretched creature, I have undone myself.

Well, though thou hast, yet desponding, despairing thoughts, which lead us to say, There is no help in God, are wicked and sinful. God accounts it his glory to help men even when they have destroyed themselves. There is a time indeed when there will be no help for sinners; but whilst in this world, we may say as Shechaniah, in Ezra x. 2, "Yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing." Oh make use of that scripture when thou seest thyself sink down even to the very gulf, oh, yet there is hope in the God of Israel for this very thing. Suppose thy condition be worse than any in the world, yet you know, it has not been known what God has laid up for them that love him; there is still help in God.

Yea, but will he help? O doubting soul, reason thus:

1. There is help in God, and he accounts it his glory

Inde sequitur, predestinationem, vocationem, et gratiam non esse ex praevisis predestinationum meritis; sed ex Deo predestinantur, vocantur, gratia sua predestinatos preveniente: hanc enim sententiam videtur Cornelius a Lapide in loc.

Multa bona facit Deus in homine, quae non facit homo nulla facit homo: quae Deus non facit ut faciat homo. August.

Cupio te defendere, te servare, hoc vere esse, Deum esse. Luther.

to be a helper. He accounts it not so much his glory to be a destroyer, no, that is his "strange work," but to be a helper, that is his great glory.

2. When men are most undone, even then is the time for God to help. "Thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help." Oh, come and return, there may yet be help for thee, though thou hast destroyed thyself.

"Thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help." This may be said in aggravation of their sin and stubbornness: Why dost thou not come in to me? have not I always been a help to thee in all times of straits and distresses? You are in great misery; now I am the same that I ever was, there is yet help enough in me: from whence,

Obs. 5. If the misery of those who yet heretofore seen help in God increases, and they sink yet lower and lower, they had need examine themselves thoroughly. Surely they have shut the door against themselves for help, for God is never weary of doing good; "The Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear: but your iniquities have separated between you and your God," Isa. lix. 1, 2. I beseech you mark but this, there is a great difference between God and man in this helping. Men that are very kind and helpful sometimes, yet at other times will be very surly and harsh towards the same whom formerly they much befriended, and that not from any cause without, but merely from the temper of their own hearts, and the change that has taken place in their own spirits; not because those that they have been kind to are worse now than before, no, but because of a froward, surly, harsh humour that is risen up in themselves; you shall see such a difference in men who have been very sweet, loving, and helpful to you at some times; but come to them at other times, and you shall find them dogged, and surly, and harsh, and you cannot tell what has provoked them; it arises from nothing but a distemper within. Thus it is with men, but it is not so with God. "Thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thine help," it is still; I have been thy helper all thy days, and still am the same God, ready to do thee good, and to help thee.

Obs. 6. The more God has helped any, the greater will be their destruction, if they be destroyed at last. "Thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help." I have been a help always, I was ever ready to help and to do good, and yet thou art undone. Oh, to be destroyed when God is at hand to help, to perish when there is a fountain just before us, as Hagar, this will be sad indeed! To perish in the midst of means, and in the midst of mercies, what an aggravation will this be to men's sins another day, when they are past the time of mercy to help, then to think, Oh how gracious was God to me while I lived!

And as a nation, too, we should apply this to ourselves. "Thou hast destroyed thyself; but in me is thine help." It will be the aggravation of our misery if we should yet perish. O my brethren, consider, shall all the great stories and remarkable accounts that we have given of God's mighty working in helping us, shall they be of no other use but to aggravate our miseries at last? It would be a sad termination.

Ver. 10. I will be thy king: where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities? and thy judges of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes?

First, to speak a little to the words as you have them in your books, for the Hebrew will admit of such an * Vid. Bucer in Matt. xvii. 27. Cuncta supremo magistratus concedenda propter conscientiam; i. e. The supreme magistrate is to be submitted to in all things, but matters of conscience. He speaks of private men, not of those interpretation; and then I shall show you another reading, in my judgment, as suitable to the original.

"I will be thy king."

Notwithstanding all your plots, all your rage, I will govern you. "I will be thy king," and will do that which becometh me as the great King of heaven and earth; I will not be borne down by you with all your tumult, I will govern you, I will have mine own ends, do what you can; things shall not go as you will, but they shall go as I will have them; you would cast off my authority, but I will maintain it; "I will be thy king."

Obs. 1. It is a sad condition when God rules over a people in spite of their hearts. And yet God many times rules over people in spite of their hearts, whether they will or no; while they are plotting and striving for themselves this way and that, God is bringing about his own ends in their ruin. "The Lord reigneth; let the people tremble," Psal. xcix. 1. It is not thy fretting and willfulness that will hinder the course of God's ordering things in the world, he will be King at last do what thou canst; while thou and thousand thousands such as thou art shall perish eternally, God will be King. Oh, it is infinitely better for thee to fall down before the Lord and say, Lord, thou art above us, thou hast power over us, thou shalt be our King for ever. It is always just with God to say, "I will be thy king;" but certainly God has not made such a distance between man and man that any should say, Notwithstanding my injustice, and the misery it entails on the people, yet "I will be thy king," I will have mine own ends, mine own will. The bond between kings and states certainly is mutual.*

"I will be thy king."

I will not cast off all care of them, I will not leave them to the mercy, or rather to the cruelty, of others; but let them come and return to me, and I will deal with them as a king to defend, to govern them, and to do them good.

That God should be King over a people is his mercy, and man's felicity. This should be our prayer, Lord, give us not up to be ruled by our lusts, but do thou rule over us; and, Lord, give us not up to be ruled by the lusts of wicked men, suffer not unjust and cruel men to rule over us, but do thou reign over us. Let us say, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever."

But the words are read otherwise, thus, in the old translation, where Beza's (the Geneva) notes are; I am, where is your king that may save thee in all thy cities? And I find most interpreters adopt this.

So the Septuagint, πῶς ὁ βασιλεὺς σὸν οὖτος, where is that your king. And the Chaldee paraphrase, where is your king that should save you in all your cities? The sense is much the same.

As if he should say, I am the same God that ever I was, but where is your king that should save you in your cities? Oh may the words read so pierce the hearts of some, if ever they have had any acquaintance with God, and known what communion with God has meant, to hear but God say these words, "I am," I am the same God that ever you knew me to be; but where is your king that should save you? And if, with Pareus, you read it as here, I will be, and there make the stop; I will be, what he had said before, as a lion, a leopard, and as a bear bereaved of her whelps; and then, where is your king that should save you?

This is God's name, in Exod. iii. 14, "I am that I who by laws are appointed to be a screen between the prince and people, such as Calvin's Instit. lib. iv. cap. 20. sect. 31, saith the three estates in parliament are.

Pareus in loc.

am," or, "I will be what I will be." So saith God here, I am, I will be; but then where is "thy king? where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities? and thy judges of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes?" My brethren, I am no prophet, and have not the spirit of one to prophesy of things before, or order scripture when it should be preached on and when not; I am, you see, pursuing my ordinary course, and meeting with this scripture, am bound (according to my ability) to demonstrate to you wherein its force lies. I hope your consciences will witness that there shall not be the least straining of it, but that I endeavour to give you the story, and the temper of the people at this time. It appears plainly that there were three things that they much rested upon: 1. The king. 2. The city. 3. The nobles. Put king, and city, and nobles together, and who can prevail against us? Saith God, "Where is thy king? where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities? and thy judges of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes?" These three they put together. If our king come to the cities he will have a party and strength there, and we know the cities are able to command all the country and kingdom. The militia, and a numerous company of men and riches, are congregated in the cities, and therefore the king, together with them, and the princes, the nobles of the land who favour him, these all surely render our condition safe; and yet in the midst of all these God asks them, by way of derision and insultation, "Where is thy king? where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities?" The notes from the words are,

Obs. 2. The things that carnal hearts rest upon will vanish. Where are they? saith God; what is become of them? You would encourage one another, and say, Come, we shall have a day yet, for we have this strength, and the king and nobles for us. Where are they? Those things on which carnal hearts rest will vanish and come to nothing.

Obs. 3. God loves to insult over men in their carnal confidences. For so, he doth not say here, Your king shall not save you, nor your cities shall not save you, nor your princes and nobles shall not save you; but, Where are they? in a kind of irony: God loves to insult over the carnal confidences of men. And we find in Scripture many such passages, as in Deut. xxxii. 37, "And he shall say, Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted?" And in Isa. xix. 12, "Where are they? where are thy wise men?" What! we have got statesmen, men versed in state affairs, we have them with us. But "where are they?" saith God. Thus the Lord insults over men that put their confidence in the flesh, and especially when they have been confident in their own ways, forsaking God, and so bringing themselves to misery; when they have brought themselves to misery by forsaking the ways of God, then God insults, Now where are these things in which you so confided?

And truly, even the saints, so be it they do it in a holy, humble way, may have some kind of triumph over ungodly men; only as so much carnality still adheres to them, there is danger, they had need keep their hearts very low: but if they do it in the strength of God, we have it in Scripture, "The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn." Only keep your hearts (I say) low, and you may come to see the glory of God, and then triumph in his, that God has heard your prayer, and has been with his people; and that though the enemy has had so much power and strength in the flesh, yet the Lord has disappointed them.

Obs. 4. It will greatly confound carnal hearts, when they shall be asked, Where is their confidence? They shall be found speechless. When they shall be asked, Where is your bravery, and pride, and the stoutness of your hearts? they shall be able to say nothing. Oh! this will pour confusion and shame upon them. Certainly, ere long, all carnal hearts that make their boast in the pomp and glory of the world shall be greatly confounded.

"Where?" I say, this confounding "where" will be asked of every wicked and ungodly man: what will they be able to say then? In Judg. ix. 28, we read of one "Gaal the son of Ebed," who said, "Who is Abimelech?" but in ver. 38, when Abimelech came with strength against him, Zebul said to him, "Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him?" When men are in their pride and bravery, then they scorn at God and men, they little regard any thing that is said to them; but when God brings them down low, then where is that mouth of thine that did so boast, and speak so proudly?

My brethren, let us learn from hence, therefore, to seek after, and rest upon, those things of which we may be able always to give an account where they are, if it should be asked us. The saints, if it should be asked them, Where is their God? can answer, It is the God of heaven that we have trusted in, the God that is in the highest heavens, and in the hearts of the saints; we can tell where our God is. It is just with God that wicked men should be insulted over, because they insult over the saints: if God do but seem to absent himself from his people, they will presently triumph over them, saying, Yea, where is your God? where are your prayers and fastings? Have not some of you heard such language many times in this kingdom? The saints of God can always give an answer to this "Where?" they can tell where their fastings and prayers are: but the wicked are not able to tell what is become of their confidences and boastings.

Therefore, O you saints of God, never be afraid of evil men, for ere long it will be demanded of them, where their pomp, and glory, and pride are, and they will not be able to answer.

"And thy judges of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes."

By judges, sometimes kings are meant, as Amos ii. 3, "I will cut off the judge from the midst thereof;" (he speaks, saith Drusus, of the king of Moab;) but we are to understand here their nobles and great men, upon whom they relied, for so they are called in Scripture. They had indeed judges before that time, when they said, "Give me a king and princes;" they had judges, but they were of meaner rank in comparison of those they had after: they had judges that by God's appointment governed them, but they were too mean for them; no, they must have a king, they must have princes, they must have judges that are kings and princes, great men, for these that they had to rule over them were but of their own rank, and this would not satisfy them, they must have such as were great ones, high above them: those were but ordinary men; what were they but the commons, of the same rank with other men, raised up but a little while ago from the grade of ordinary men? and why should we be ruled and governed by them? No, we must have a king, and nobles, and they must govern us: "Give me a king and princes." Read but the story of the judges, and you shall find that God had evermore appeared with them, I do not remember any one of them who prevailed not when God raised him up: but now this people regard them not; why? because they were but mean men of their own rank, though God did assist and prosper them so exceedingly.

Obs. 5. Though God be much with men, yet if they be of a low rank, carnal hearts regard them not. Let them do never so great services, and be never so instru-

Judices aliquando reus designant, ut Amos ii. 3. Excipi-dam judicem de ordinis sui. De rege Moab loquitur.

mental for the kingdom, even those that have had their estates, their liberties, and all preserved by them, and by the mighty spirit that God has put into them, yet, when the work is over, they look upon them but as mean, ordinary men, men of a common rank, and so let them go: after all the great things that God has done by them, still their thoughts and minds are upon others that are above them, upon princes, and nobles, and such men; they regard and rely more upon men in whom they see outward pomp and glory, than upon those who have evidently the presence of God with them. Oh, we see that that which has been is still to this very day.

"Of whom thou saidst, Give me a king and princes."

Where did they say so? They said so in 1 Sam. viii. 5, "Make us a king to judge us like all the nations." Indeed the word "princes" we do not find there, but here the Holy Ghost adds, "and princes;" but that must of necessity be supposed, for if there be a king, a king must have his court and nobles about him, and, as a fountain of honour, confer honour on the great men about him; so that though princes be not named there, yet the Holy Ghost supplies them as a thing that must of necessity be understood; Come, let us be governed by a king and the great ones attendant on him. But you will ask me,

What is the reason that nothing would satisfy them but a king and nobles?

If you read 1 Sam. viii., you will find that they were almost mad upon it, a king they must have, and would have. Oh! it was very grievous to Samuel's spirit: he told them their great sin, and the Lord said, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me." Samuel told them what God said, and God bade Samuel tell them what a king they should have, that he would oppress them extremely, exercise arbitrary government to the full, take away their servants and children, and do with them what he pleases; You will be brought to be his slaves, any parasite at court may easily get your estates; you shall be accounted an offender for a word, and fined at pleasure; you shall be in most miserable bondage, if you have a king. But now after Samuel had told them all this, "Nay," say they, "but we will have a king." If any one should come and reason, Why do you desire a king so much? what will you get by it? do not you think that he will have your estates, your liberties, and all you possess, at his disposal? no one could deny this, they did not deny the least word that Samuel said, but they held their conclusion, "Nay, but we will have a king." What should make them thus? These seven reasons may be given for it.

1. For novelty's sake. They had tried other kinds of government before, but now they would have somewhat more. Men's spirits are very much given to change, though they can give no rational account why they desire it.

2. They might entertain some distrust of their former judges; because they were men of meaner rank, they might think that they should not be able to help them; Let us, say they, have a king that shall go before us in our wars. Though they had never so much experience of the judges, yet they thought there would be more good if they had great ones, and they were afraid that these men of a lower, meaner rank would fail them at last.

3. They might desire to be like other nations, because they loved pomp. What! say they, shall we see our neighbouring nations governed by those who have great pomp and glory, and shall we be governed by men that were but tradesmen a while ago? No, they would be like other nations.

4. Perhaps they had experienced some oppressions from the former judges. Though most of them were good, yet certainly there can be no human government but will afford some cause at one time or other for some to complain. Take the best government that can be in the world, yet, seeing it is a government of men and administered by men, there will be some cause or other at some period for complaint. Now this is the peevishness of men's hearts, that if there be but any condition wherein they suffer, they do nothing but complain of their suffering, and desire a change; and they never think of the inconveniences and sufferings that may result. They would be rid of these to whom they were now subject, and would have a king. These men angered them, laid on them some odious taxes; now, so be it they might get rid of them, they care not what they bring upon themselves; and therefore, "Nay, but we will have a king."

5. Out of a spirit of opposition against the way of God's appointment. God was their Governor, and their hearts rose against his rule, through a mere spirit of opposition, though they could give no reason why they might not be as well under it as any other: but it was God's way, and there is an opposition in the heart of man to any thing that has God in it.

6. They had some hopes that they should have more liberty for their lusts. Now, in their present form of government, there was more inspection over them, and they could not so easily corrupt their rulers; but in a merely human government, if they could but make a friend of their ruler, they might do what they list; if they would but consent to be a slave to him, they might make all their neighbours slaves to them: they had probably a great deal more hopes of licence for their lusts in this than their present government.

7. Many of them had hopes to get preferment this way. Let us have a king and princes, and we shall so get preferments and places in the court, therefore we will not be satisfied with any other way but this; we live in a mean, low condition without this, but we shall get preferments by the change, therefore give us a king.

But now this is observable, Though they thought they had a great deal of reason for themselves, yet after they had once smarted, and found indeed that there was upon them, after they had these kings and princes, more oppression than ever they were under in their lives; now was a time that Hosea could speak freely to them, and say in the name of God, Where is your king, and those men for whom you were so earnest? what good have you got? For it is observable, though they were never so eager upon having a king, yet, if you read the story in Samuel, when God did but thunder from heaven, then they exclaimed, "We have sinned." When they were under oppression, then Hosea could speak freely and plainly to them, Where is your king? and where are these men?

Obs. 6. Men will not hear so long as they do not suffer. If men be once bent upon a certain course, and have their estates about them, and countenance from great ones, speak what you will against their way, they will not hear you; but let these men smart, and find by experience the evil of their course, then you may speak to them and say, Do you think now that was wisely done, for which you were so eager? do you think you dealt well for yourselves? Oh then they will be ready to say, I confess I did not think so seriously of those things before, I looked only upon that which appeared good for the present, and now after-vit is bought, although it be dear, I see cause to repent.

My brethren, surely kings and nobles are great blessings of God when they are good. You see I have not in the least strained the place, but held forth to you its true scope. Let none go away and say, that I inveighed against kings, or nobles; certainly in themselves they are great blessings of God, and we must acknowledge it fitting to have a difference between man and man.

It is a slander that is upon a sort of people, as if they would have all things to lie level, and one to have as much honour as the other. God forbid we should have such a thought: let us give honour to those whom God would have honoured, and never envy nor grudge at their honour: if God pleases to send those that are good, I say, they may be great instruments of great blessings of God to us. But now mark the very next words that follow in the 11th verse. They would have a king.

Ver. 11. I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath.

They were ready to say, Why do you thus blame us for our eager desire? did not God approve of it? God himself was content we should have one; God himself chose our first king, Saul, and appointed Samuel to anoint him. And if you understand it of the other king, Jeroboam, for so interpreters go, they might say, And Jeroboam also; did not God foretell by the prophet, that Jeroboam should have ten tribes? and did not the man of God tell us that this was from the Lord? And therefore why should you so much upbraid us about our kings? it is the mind and will of God that we should have them.

The answer of the prophet is: True, God did give you a king, and appointed Samuel to anoint him, and foretold that Jeroboam should be king over the ten tribes; yea, but it was in his anger; he gave you one indeed, but it was in his anger. You were so set upon it, that you would have one; if you will, take him, saith God, and take him with all that shall follow after: so that it was (as one speaks) rather from an angry God, than from an entreated God.

"I gave thee a king in mine anger." Saul and Jeroboam were given in anger, those primarily, as a punishment of their sin: Saul as a punishment of their sin in rejecting Samuel, and in their disobedience to Samuel, and the way of government that they had then. And Jeroboam was given as a punishment of their sin of idolatry, that was committed in Solomon's time (as also of their rebellion and apostacy): and yet it is said that God did it.

Obs. 1. God may have a hand in things wherein men sin exceedingly. They sinned in getting a king, they sinned exceedingly in setting up Jeroboam, and yet God has such a hand in it, that he saith, I gave them these things. Calvin, (and I the rather cite his words here, because the adversaries would east that aspersion on him, that he held that God was the author of sin,) on this very place, saith,* From this place we learn, that God does so exercise his judgments, that whatsoever evil there is, it is to be ascribed to men; whatsoever good, to himself: God seems to direct this work wholly to his own providence. From hence let us learn soberly to admire the secret judgments of God; neither let us imitate those impure dogs: impure dogs! what are they that do therefore grin and bark at God, because they cannot understand how God doth use wicked men? because they understand not this, they conclude that God is the cause of sin. He calls them the impure dogs, because they understand not how God doth work in making use of wicked men, that God is the author and cause of sin. His spirit was much against this, and therefore it was an extreme slander upon him, as if he should hold such an opinion. That is the first. God may have a hand in things wherein men sin extremely; and yet he remain holy.

Obs. 2. Things that are very evil, may yet have present success. It was a very evil thing for them to desire a king at this time, and likewise for the people to rend from the house of David, yet both of them succeeded according to their desire. Let us then learn never to judge of the goodness of a thing by its success. Say some, I warrant you we will have this; and if they get what they desire, they think God approves of it: they may desire a thing, and be set upon it, and though much be said to the contrary, yet they may drive on their designs, and prosper in it; but this is no argument that God owns it as good: never judge of things by success.

Obs. 3. God's gifts are not always in love. "I gave thee a king," saith he, but "in mine anger." God's gifts are not always in love; no, they are in anger many times. Read but Numb. xi. 18—20, you shall find there God giving people their desires. He lets them have them, but how? "Say thou unto the people, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh: for ye have wept in the ears of the Lord, saying, Who shall give us flesh to eat? for it was well with us in Egypt: therefore the Lord will give you flesh." You have wept and cried, saying, "Who shall give us flesh?" "The Lord will give you flesh;" and "ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days; but even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils;" you shall have enough of it, even till "it be loathsome unto you:" why? "because that ye have despised the Lord which is among you." The Lord gave them their desires, because they had despised him. So you are ready to bless yourselves that you have what you would have, and think that therefore God regards you, whereas God gives you what you desire because you have sinned against him; if he were not angry with you, he would not give it. Saith Augustine, God many times in giving is angry, in denying is merciful.

It is because he is angry that he gives you such things as you would have. So in Psal. lxxviii. 29—31, God gives them flesh according to their desires, but "while their meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them." If we had time a little to open this most excellent point, it might quiet our desires; for we might endeavour to speak of the several ways of God's giving, that, by comparing one thing with another, we might learn to distinguish whether a thing be given in love or in anger, come to know how much is in it of God's loving-kindness.

But only now let me leave this with you about it, Take heed of immoderate desires for any worldly thing: take heed of saying, I must, and I will, and I will have it; whenever you find your hearts strongly rising to a thing, then be afraid, be afraid of having it, as much as you were of having any thing in your lives. No one can have any comfort in any thing as coming from God's love, until they can first quiet their hearts, and be willing to be at God's disposal, be willing to be without it; that is one main sign of God's giving in anger, or in love. When any find an eager desire after a thing, Oh it is very suitable to such and such a purpose; yea, but now if I can go alone and consider that God is wiser than I, and knows what is best for me; if I can labour to work my heart to this, Lord, if it be good for me, then I desire it; but if thou seest it would not be good, then Lord, here I am, do with me what seems good in thine eyes; as David did: surely nature could not but work strongly in his case, when leaving the holy city, yet he said, "If I shall find obganiunt, quia non possunt agnoscere quomodo Deus utatur etiam improbis hominibus, quia hoc non percipiunt, concludunt Dominum esse causa peccati. Calv. in loc.

* Ex hoc loco discimus, Deum sic exercere sua judicia, ut quicquid mali est, debeat hominibus ascribi: Deus videtur hinc totum cogere sua providentia, discimus admirari sobrie arcana Dei judicia, neque intuemur impuros istos canes qui favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and show me both it, and his habitation: but if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him," 2 Sam. xv. 25, 26. Yea, this was a trial indeed, and doubtless this temper of David's heart in his affliction was the thing that gave him so much enlargement to praise God, when he returned to the ark and city again. Had David vented himself in impatient complainings; What! must I go from the city of Jerusalem? how doth God deal with me! I am resolved I will return to Jerusalem and take possession of the city, whatsoever comes of it, though it even cost me my life; perhaps David might have gotten thither, but there would not have been so much love of God in it, as when he could give up himself to God's disposal. And so, if this people could have said thus, True, Lord, thou art our King, but we are despised because we are governed by men of such mean quality: and the truth is, God had promised them a king also, and therefore it was not such an evil thing to desire a king, the evil lay in the eagerness of their desire, they would have him now: if they had been but quiet, and said, Lord, thou dost tell us in thy word of a king that we shall have, Lord, fulfil this thy word, and for the present we are content to submit to thee, as long as thou thinkest fit; now, it may be, God would have given them a king then, or presently after, and so they might have had a holy and gracious king; but they must have him now, and so they had him with the anger of God. You remember the words of Rachel to Jacob, "Give me children, or else I die." She had a child and died; though it was not in God's anger as an enemy, yet it was a fatherly anger. O think but of this, you women that are so desirous of children, or any outward blessing. You, too, who are desirous of altering your condition, as in marriage, and must needs have such a one, although you beg your bread all your days, and although parents are against it, and you cannot, even yourselves, discern evidences of grace. Now, saith God, you shall have it, you shall join together, and you shall work your own misery by this eagerness of your spirit. O brethren, let us learn to be moderate in our desires, and commit them with our hearts to God.

"I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath."

I have observed before that God's gifts are not always in love, and now, because it is an important point, there are two things which I desire to do very briefly.

I. To show you, how a man may know that what God gives him is given in anger, and not in love.

II. To draw some corollaries from the foregoing.

I. How we may know that what God gives is in anger, and not in love. It is a very hard thing to convince men, if they have their desires satisfied, that it is rather from anger than love. Men are so well pleased with the satisfying of their desires, that they can very hardly be convinced but that God intends good to them in it; and therefore you shall find, in 1 Sam. xii. 17, that God was fain to do one of his great and wonderful works to convince this people that the king whom he gave them there was given in anger rather than in love: "Is it not wheat harvest to-day? I will call unto the Lord, and he shall send thunder and rain; that ye may perceive and see that your wickedness is great, which ye have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking you a king." Samuel had before, in chap. viii. told them of their sin in asking a king, but they would not be convinced; "Nay," say they, "but we will have a king over us." Now saith Samuel, It is wheat harvest; and whereas it was a strange and wonderful thing for the Jews to have rain then, but though it be harvest time, yet it shall rain and thunder; and all to the end that you may be convinced of your great wickedness in asking you a king. They had not only had their desires granted before this time, but, as they thought, had them, in some wise, confirmed; for Saul had prospered after he had been a king: but yet for all that, (saith he,) I will give you an evident demonstration, that it is not in love that you have him, but it was your great wickedness in seeking you a king. "So Samuel called unto the Lord; and the Lord sent thunder and rain that day." And then, in ver. 19, "All the people said unto Samuel, Pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God, that we die not: for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king:" now we do acknowledge it to be a very great and sore evil indeed, though our king has prospered a while, yet God shows us now that it is an evil. And by this you may see that it is hard for men to be convinced, when they have according to their hearts' desires, that it is in anger rather than in love.

But to give you some notes, whereby you may be helped to see, whether what you have granted by God according to your desires be in anger or love:

1. When you desire a gift, rather than God in it. When your desires are for the gift rather than the Giver, you can have no comfort that there is love in it. There is no man that has to deal with another, if he knows that what he does desire from him, it is not out of love to him, but merely from the love of the gift, certainly, though he may give him for some other ends, yet he does not give it out of love. Those desires that are not out of love, are not satisfied from love. Love satisfies no desires that are not raised by love; love acts always upon love. Now God knows what the ground of our desires is; if we desire the gift rather than the Giver, rather than God in it, we can have no comfort that our enjoyments proceed from love. Whatsoever a gracious heart would have from God, yet this is the main thing in its desires, Oh, let me have God in them! such is my condition in this world, that God appoints that I shall not enjoy him immediately altogether, but I shall enjoy him through such and such mercies, oh then that I might have these mercies, that I might enjoy him in them! Certainly any thing that thou hast in satisfaction of such desires is out of love; but when thou lookest no further than the creature, wouldst have the thing, but lookest not at God in it, thou canst not expect the love of God to be conveyed by it.

2. When our desires are immoderate and violent.

This was just the case of this people here: "Nay, but we will have a king over us," we must needs have him; whatsoever comes of it, we will have him. When God satisfies the desires of his people in his love, he first quiets their hearts, bringing them into a sweet and blessed moderation; but when men's hearts are so violent, that the thing they desire they must have, God many times saith, You shall have it then, take it; but then he speaks not in love, that is very remarkable: Numb. xi. and Psal. lxxviii. 29—31, and other passages, confirm this point. But I would further remark of that Psalm, that the Lord, after he had showed that he did not answer their desires in love, but in wrath, then, in ver. 31, saith, after the judgments of God had come upon them in the satisfying of their desires, that many of them were slain by God; and the parallel passage referred to in Numbers saith, "He called the name of that place Kibroth-hattaavah, because there they buried the people that lusted;" that is, The sepulchres of the lusts of their desires: God sets a brand upon that place, Here, saith he, are the graves of the desirers; they must needs have flesh, and they stood upon their desires, their desires must be satisfied; and here are the graves of the desirers, saith God. O remember, you that lust after evil things, remember when your desires are immoderate and violent, it is just with God to set a brand by some remarkable hand of his against you, and say, Here is the mark of these desires that were so immoderate and so violent.

3. When God grants men their desires before the due time. They have what they would have, but they have it not in God's time. Children long with desire after green fruit, but if they could stay but a few weeks or months, one apple then would be worth a hundred when they are green; but they cannot stay, they must have the fruit when it is green; they have it, but it does them no good. So when we have our desires satisfied before the due time, it proceeds not from love. God had promised that Israel should have a king in due time, that there should come kings from the loins of Abraham; and in Deut. xvii. 14, there is a prophecy of the king they should have: yea, but they would not stay God's time, and therefore he was given not out of love. Psal. cvi. 13, it is said of those that did so lust that God gave them their lusts in his wrath, "they waited not for his counsel." That is noted there. Oh, we should be willing to wait for God's counsel. We would have the thing presently done; yea, but God's counsel works one thing after another, in mutual dependence, and we should be willing to wait for his counsel: if we will not mind God's counsel, but must have our desires satisfied, and that now, we cannot expect love in them, but rather wrath: he gives unto them in his anger.

4. When God grants us what we would have, but without the blessing. He grants the thing, but takes away the blessing of the thing, he takes away the comfort and satisfaction of it; "They shall eat, but they shall not be satisfied." So in Psal. cvi. 15, "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul:" this is a similitude transferred from the body to the soul. Men may often have a dog's appetite, (as the physicians call it,) that is, a mighty greedy stomach, but they cannot digest what they eat, and so the body is lean; so here, they had a mighty desire, but as in the body many times there is such a disease that the meat turns not to nourishment, so in their souls, they had even that which their souls desired, yea, but their souls could not be satisfied. The body thrives not with what it eats when it has such a disease upon it; so, though the soul virtually has what it desired, yet it had a distemper with it; thus it could not be satisfied, nor thrive, nor prosper with what it had: "He sent leanness into their soul." How often are we greedily desirous of certain things, and think, Oh how happy should I be if I had them! It may be God lets you have your desires, but when he has he snatches away the comfort of it; you shall have a well, but it shall have no bottom, you shall not be able to get out the good and comfort in what you have. Surely God is not in it, for the blessing of God maketh rich, and addeth no sorrow with it; no, it brings comfort.

5. When that which we desire is merely to satisfy our lusts; merely that we might have our humours and lusts satisfied, that is all. We do not desire such and such things that by them we may be fitted for the service of God, we cannot give an account why these and these things should help us in the work of the Lord, but that we may go on as well without them; but they are suitable to our lusts. Oh! if God does give thee any thing to satisfy thy lusts, certainly he gives it in his wrath: as now, if a man have a disease in his body, and his enemy know what will feed his disease, he will gladly give it him that he may be the sooner despatched; no faithful physician, no loving friend, will give to any that which will feed their disease, but will rather take it from them in love. Oh! the Lord sees men's hearts set upon such and such lusts, and if certain things which they desire are granted them, their lusts will be fed by them; They shall have them, saith God. It is as dangerous a sign of reprobation as any thing, to give them that which shall be most suitable to their lusts, that shall most harden them; and on the other side, a token of the greatest love, when God shall take that from his children which he knows will but feed their lusts. Many diseases are such, that the only way to cure them is to keep the patient on a short diet; though they cry for food, and be very hungry, yet they must be kept very low; why? because the nature of the disease is such as will draw all nourishment to its own increase: and so God is fain to do with his own people, when he sees them sick of a disease which will naturally draw to its centre all the nourishment afforded.

6. When men are so eager that they care not whether the gift comes from a reconciled or a provoked God; it is all one to them: Let me have it; but whether it comes from God reconciled, or God provoked, they little care. In Numb. xi. is the notable story before referred to, of God's satisfying desires in his wrath. In the beginning of the chapter God is very much provoked with the people: "When the people complained, it displeased the Lord: and the Lord heard it; and his anger was kindled; and the fire of the Lord burnt among them, and consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camp. And the people cried unto Moses," and so the judgment was removed from them. But then, presently after, they fell to murmuring before ever any thing was done to reconcile God and their souls together. You do not read of any work of humiliation to seek reconciliation with God, between the time in which God manifested his sore displeasure against them, and that in which he satisfied their desires; no, they looked not at that, let them only have their desires; hence it came to be that their desires were satisfied in wrath.

Does thy conscience tell thee that there has been a time wherein God has been displeased with thee, and his anger has burst out against thee? Perhaps thou art in a better condition now than thou wast before; O, but tell me, hast thou humbled thy soul before God to make up thy peace with him? Has there been a day of atonement between God and thy soul? Has God's displeasure been out against thee, and now does he come and satisfy thee in what thou dost desire, before any thing has been done in falling down before him and seeking his face, and making peace? Thou canst not have comfort in this. Thy desires are satisfied rather in wrath than in mercy.

7. When God regards not our preparation for a mercy. Carnal hearts take no great care themselves of it, Let me have it, say they, our fitness matters not. It is your sin and wickedness not to regard the preparation of your hearts for what you have; and it is God's judgment to give it to you before you be prepared. A gracious heart, when it would have a mercy, is as careful to get the heart prepared for the mercy, as to obtain it. Those things would indeed suit me, but is my heart fit for such a deliverance? is my heart fit for such mercies? If it be thy care to prepare thy heart when thou art labouring for the mercy, surely, when it comes, it must be sweet indeed; but when there is no preparation before, thou canst not know that it is in love. We little think that we have need of preparation for mercies. If indeed God should threaten some judgment, we would think that we had need be prepared; but certainly there is as great need for preparation for mercies, to be able to make good use of them, as for afflictions, to be able to bear them. This I have likewise from Numb. xi. 18; it is said, "And say thou unto the people, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow." There is a charge that they should sanctify themselves against to-morrow, for God would give them flesh. I do not find that they did do it, but when God promised to give them flesh, he bid them sanctify themselves; as if he should say, If that your desires come before you have sanctified yourselves, it will be in wrath, not in mercy. O, therefore, when earnest to have your desires satisfied think thus, The Lord charges thee to sanctify thyself; do I take care of this? do I make it my endeavour to sanctify myself before the mercy comes? Then thou mayst have comfort in it, and not otherwise.

8. When we rest on the means we use, and seek not God by prayer. Whatever we enjoy that we get not by prayer before, or sanctified by prayer after, we cannot know that it proceeds from love. "Thou preventest him," saith David, Psal. xxi. 3, "with the blessings of goodness." God sometimes acts so towards his saints, but generally, when he intends a mercy from love, he first fills the heart with the spirit of prayer; when a mercy comes after much prayer, then it is surely a mercy from love. When the saints have been praying, and then God has come in with mercy, oh then they have gathered arguments of God's love to them; This I had because I sought thee: as Hannah did concerning Samuel: how did she rejoice in Samuel! "For this child I prayed," saith Hannah unto Eli; oh this is the mercy that I prayed for; therefore she called her child's name Samuel, one "asked of the Lord." And so when we can call every gift we have, Samuel, that is, a gift asked of God, a gift gotten by prayer, this is an argument of love. But otherwise we can have no assurance that it is from love. True, a king was not unlawful for them to desire, because they had such intimations in Scripture; but they acted not so much out of regard to them; no, they come to Samuel, and say, "Give us a king;" we do not read that they go to God for it. Such a great change of their state as that was, one would think, should have required divers days in seeking of God. It was a mighty change, to a new kind of government, from one that was of God's own appointment, to a form of government similar to that of the surrounding nations. Yet we find no days of prayer for this great change, and therefore it was in wrath that they had it. Therefore when you would have any thing, look not so much to come by it according to second causes, but be much in prayer, according to the excellency of the thing for which you seek.

9. When God gives our desires, but not a sanctified use of them. When God gives you the shell, but not the kernel, surely it is not in love. If your children should ask a nut of you, and you give them a nut that has no kernel, they will not think (if so be that you knew it) that it is in any great love. Truly, all the good things that wicked men have, they are but shells without kernels, they are not in love. The kernel of every blessing is a proportionable measure of grace to use it for God. You have a great desire that God should change your condition; if he should, and not give you a heart fit for that, you had better be without the change. You have a desire that God should prosper you in such a business; yea, but if he does not teach you how to abound, you had been better never to have abounded. Now it is not in love for God to give any success, except he gives a measure of grace proportioned to the success; therefore this you should all examine; The Lord has altered my condition, and many good things I have more than before; but what graces have I more than before? what exercise of grace, what work of grace, more than before? Certainly if it be in love it will be so.

10. When a secret curse attends what we have. If so be that a man should be very hungry, and have a mighty desire to satisfy himself, and he falls greedily upon his meat and eats it, but as soon as he has eaten it his body swells to an enormous size, surely he begins to think then that all is not well. Lord have mercy upon me, saith he, afraid that he is poisoned. So God gives you your desire, and as soon as you have it you begin to swell, you are bigger than you were before, your hearts are proud, and you can look scornfully upon others; oh, you are poisoned; this is an ill satisfying of your hunger, you are poisoned surely in this. In Isa. x. 16, you have a notable expression to this purpose; "Therefore shall the Lord, the Lord of hosts, send among his fat ones leanness; and under his glory he shall kindle a burning like the burning of a fire." Even such things wherein there appears to be a great deal of glory, such things perhaps as when your desires are satisfied you can glory in; oh you glory in such and such a mercy, such a good thing you have above others; but under this glory there is a burning kindled, there is a great deal of the wrath of God in it, a secret curse attends it.

11. When we regard not what becomes of others, so we have our desires satisfied. And this is from their example here. Let us have a king. A king! what shall become of Samuel then? has not he judged you, and been faithful with you? What! will you show yourselves so ungrateful to him for all the good he has done to you, as to reject him, and his house, and family? Oh, they cared not for that; Let us have a king; let what will become of Samuel and his house, what care they? And so when men are greedy in their desires, Let us have such and such a thing, but care not what becomes of others, it is another note of desires not granted in love.

12. When God, in satisfying of our desires, makes way for some judgment. Now indeed the thing that we have is comfortable, but stay awhile, and you shall see there is some judgment approaching by that very thing which you receive; and when the judgment is come, afterwards you will see how the mercy made way for it: very great judgments many times befall men, that are made way for by the satisfying of their own desires. God has many ways to prepare a path for his anger, often by giving you your desires; there is nothing more ordinary in experience than this, and therefore we need not stand upon it. If you will but examine the course of your lives, sometimes you may see, that if God had satisfied your desires in such and such things, it would have made way for the greatest misery that ever you had in all your lives; and when God denies sometimes to his people, they can confess, O Lord, I see that had I had my desires gratified, I had been undone. And on the other side, you will find that those things which you account the greatest mercies to you, do make way for the greatest evils; surely, then, they were not given in love.

13. When men are greedy of things to the disregard of the results; when they would have their desires satisfied in a foolish way, never minding what inconveniences may follow, but merely looking to their present comfort. Thus it was here; they would have a king; Samuel came and told them all the inconveniences that would follow upon it, how that they should have this affliction and the other; You that are so desirous of him, if he comes among you, he will bring you into slavery, your estates and your children shall be under his power, you will be in slavery to every courtier. Nay, but we will have a king for all this: they would needs change the way of government; Oh that we might have a king! and they would be brought more under law than before; for indeed in the time of the judges, you find that the people of Israel enjoyed a great deal of liberty, and obeyed the judges in a great measure voluntarily; you thus find but two tribes that followed Barak and Deborah, and so of Jephthah, and Samson, those that "offered themselves willingly among the people" followed them, Judg. v. 9; and with Gideon those of Ephraim "did chide sharply," Judg. viii. 1; so much freedom there was in the time of the judges. Yea, but we will have a king, and we will all then be tied to the same thing, and be under the same power, and so there will ensue firm union: we shall no longer act each according to his own will, but all shall come in and join under the same law, and so we shall go on unitedly. Certainly this was their reasoning in their desire of having a king. Now this kind of union among the people, doubtless, was very good, but they considered not what inconveniences might result from their being thus chained together. Prisoners that are chained at a post are together all the day long; but would you have such a kind of union, would you be united with such chains? Consider, that with the union slavery may come upon you. But they did not consider any such things; No matter, say they, come, let us all be joined in one, and let the same law be upon every one. But now, how this would bring them under bondage and slavery in those things they would be loth to be brought under in, they considered not at all.

14. When men seek to have their desires satisfied merely because they love change. We cannot have any comfort that God's gifts proceed from love, when they are sought for out of a foolish, inconstant spirit. They thought they had been long enough under judges, and in a mere desire of novelty, not knowing what might come of such a change, demanded a king. And so people, though there be never so much good in a way, yet out of a novelty they would fain have a change; and if God grant them a change when they have no other ground but that for it, it is a sign that there is wrath in it, and not love.

15. When it is through impatience to submit to God in a former condition. It is ill when granted to gratify the appetite for novelty, but when given to impatience, then it is sure to be in wrath, and not in mercy. If your condition be changed, God has put you in a lower and meaner condition, it is true, it is lawful for you to desire a change; yea, but if you desire it because you cannot submit to God's hand, and it is given to you, then it is a sign that it is given in wrath: but when you have brought your hearts to this, Lord, here I am, dispose of me as thou pleasest, I am content to lie under thy hand, but, Lord, I look up to thee for mercy; consider I am a poor weak creature, and it is fit that thou shouldst have thy will, and not I mine; then if God make a change, you may have comfort that it is in mercy; but if you have it through impatience, you can have no comfort at all in it. It was just so here; they could not bear the hand of God in any present trouble that they had upon them, and so thought to help themselves by having a king, and God gave them one, but it was in his anger.

16. When our desires of further mercies make us forget former mercies. They would have a king that might go before them, and fight for them. Fight for them! did not God fight for them before? Oh, wonderful and glorious battles they had when they were under their judges, when they had Samuel to direct them, they never afterwards had more glorious victories than then: nay, you shall find in the whole story of the judges, that they did always prevail; and their judges generally were good, and guided them in God's ways; but the kings did not so, for the kings of Israel were none of them good, from the first to the last. O unthankful wretches that they are, so eager to have another condition, never minding nor blessing God for what they had, forgetful of all the good they had received. Samuel could appeal to them, "Whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken? or whom have I defrauded?" 1 Sam. xii. 3. He had judged them righteously. But they forget all God's goodness and mercy towards them, and must change their condition. O, consider this, you that desire a change; be not unthankful for what you have had: if you be so eager to have more as to forget what you have had, if God should send you more your ease is like to be worse than it is now. If one should take meat to eat before he has digested his previous food, because the new dishes brought to the table please his palate, this does not nourish him, but turns to evil humours, and so does him hurt; but if he would stay till he has digested what he has eaten before, then he might eat and be thereby nourished. You that would fain have more and more, have you digested what you have had? are you thankful for former mercies? has God had the glory of what you have had before? then, if God gives you any thing, you may have comfort to your souls that it comes out of love.

17. When men desire new things out of distrust of God, and make such conclusions of unbelief; Surely if God should not grant such and such things unto them, then they are lost and undone, and there is no way in the world to help them. Their desires are excited by distrust; whereas, (my brethren,) gracious desires are the fruit of faith, it is the prayer of faith that does good; it is faith that inflames the gracious desires which are sent up to God, they are sent up by the strength of faith, and not the strength of unbelief. It is the strength of unbelief that makes the desires of people so strong as they are, as thus: These people desired a king; why? because they could not trust God to have but only judges as they had before. Samuel was an old man, and his sons were naught, and they see themselves in a hard condition; yea, but now seeing God had not spoken to them about a new government, they should have had it from God, if at all, God should have chosen them one; but they thought that they must have one to go before them in their battles, or else they would miscarry, and they saw the princes of the earth that they went before their subjects in their battles, and therefore they would be like unto them, and durst not trust God in that way in which they were before. And therefore it was in wrath that God gave them their desires.

18. If, when God changes our condition, we bring the sins of our old condition into our new, we can have no assurance that the change proceeds from love. Our care should be, when our condition is changed, to ask, What were the sins of my former condition? what were the sins of my afflicted, my low condition? Let me take heed that I do not bring into my new state my former corruptions.

19. If we seek to attain our desires by unlawful means, certainly that is cursed. If God does let us prosper in ways that are unlawful in themselves, we cannot believe that what we enjoy proceeds from love, but from wrath.

I have the more willingly enlarged on this point because of its great usefulness.

II. Now then, by way of corollary, from all that has been said, let us learn,

1. To take heed that we quiet ourselves in our desires. Be not too earnest in your desires. Remember that scripture, 1 Cor. x. 6, "Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they also lusted." It refers to their lusting for their quails, here called "lusting after evil things;" though the things themselves were good, yet the manner of their lusting made them evil to them. These are for our example, that we should not lust so as they lusted. When you read Numb. xi. and Psal. lxxviii., and there find how they lusted after evil things, and how the wrath of God came upon them when they had their desires satisfied, remember that these things "are written for our admonition," 1 Cor. x. 11. And so when we read of their eager desires after a king, and what they met withal when they had him, it should teach us so far to moderate our desires, as to labour to regulate them by the word, and to subject them to the mind of the blessed God.

2. To prepare our hearts for what we have, and to seek proportionable grace for any thing that we do desire. Treasure up this lesson. When thou wouldst have a mercy from God, O seek proportionable grace, and prepare thyself for the mercy.

3. Not to be too much exalted when thou hast thy desires satisfied. Methinks this point might be as a prick, to prick the bladders of the pride of men's hearts. O, take heed, though you have prospered according to your desires. Saul prospered a great while, and yet it was in wrath. Certainly there is no great matter to be expected from such things as we may have in God's wrath, and therefore no cause to be exalted.

4. Never to draw any arguments of God's love, by our desires in outward things being satisfied. It is a vain conceit of people to think thus, God loves me; why? because I have desired such and such things, and God has given them to me. If a man were to go and choose a wife, and knew her face were painted, would he conclude, Surely here is one of an excellent complexion? No, he would rather suspect it. Truly it would be as just to infer that this woman's complexion, and the constitution of her body, are sound and good, as to conclude that my condition is good because God satisfies my desires.

5. Never to envy any men who have their lusts satisfied. There is little cause that you should envy them. Were you to see a man that loves wine drink some which you knew to be poisoned, or a man with a satin suit which you knew had the plague in it, there were no cause of envying either; water, or a leather suit, were a great deal better. God satisfies men many times, but it is in wrath, and to prepare them for slaughter.

6. To be content to wait patiently, and when our desires are denied. Oh, this is a point of very great use, to teach us patience when God denies us. Be patient and content when God denies you your desires, for you do not know what God may aim at in it.

7. Not to rest in what you enjoy, but to seek to know the source from whence it comes. And this I take to be as special a difference as any I know between a carnal and a gracious heart. A carnal heart thinks thus, If I have the thing, I care not for any more; but a gracious heart looks at the principle from whence it comes, he loves to look at the root and source. A gardener that owes the flowers, regards the root more than the flower a great deal; but a stranger is more pleased with the flower than with the root. So carnal hearts look only at flowers, but gracious hearts look at the root. I have such and such a thing, but have I an evidence of God's love? Look how high the head of the fountain is, so high the water will go, and no higher. Water will ascend as high as the place was from whence it descended. And so every mercy we have will carry us as high as from whence it came. If from common, general bounty, it carries us to God but in a common, general way; but if it comes in special love through Christ, it carries us to God in Christ.

8. To seek those gifts which God never grants to any but in love. There are some things of such a noble and excellent nature, that God never grants them to any but in love, they are precious things indeed. And 'his one consideration shows the difference, as much as any thing I know, between spiritual and temporal blessings. Temporal blessings, though they are in themselves good, and attended with many sweet accommodations, yet they are of such a low nature, that many times they come to men out of God's wrath; they may consist with wrath, yea, they may flow from wrath. But spiritual blessings, the graces of God's Spirit, those spiritual blessings wherewith we are blessed in Christ

Jesus, are of such a nature that they can never come but from love, and out of love. From this you see, that a little grace is more worth than the enjoyment of all the world. God may give a man the empire of all the world, and he may do it in wrath, and the gift tend to the furtherance of wrath; but if you have but the least dram of grace, if you have but any spiritual knowledge of God in Christ, "this is life eternal." "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent," John xvii. 3. Faith; this is a precious gift. If thou hast any knowledge of the Divine nature, it comes from the infinite ocean of eternal love, and will carry thee to the infinite ocean of love. O, then, prize grace, seek after grace.

You whose hearts have been so eager and desirous after outward things, turn now the stream of your desires. I have been eager after such and such things; if I have them, yet I may have the wrath of God with them, and what good will they do me then? Oh, but I hear of things that are to be had, which I can never receive but in love, they are the privileges that come to the saints in Jesus Christ.

9. To bless God, if we know and find that what we have proceeds from love. You are to bless God for what you have; but in that he has given you your desires, and given them out of love too, here God blesses his blessings, and your blessings should be double, treble, seven, a hundredfold. The Lord has delivered me from such an affliction, and I find it is in love. As Hezekiah could say, when he "was recovered of his sickness," "Thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption," Isa. xxxviii. 17; so I make no question but many of the people of God, even many of you that are before him this day, are able to say, Well, from the observations which I have heard this day upon this point, thus opened, I can say, to the glory of God, Out of love to my soul has he delivered me out of such an affliction, from such a sickness; out of love to my soul has he granted me such a mercy: I had been praying and crying to him for certain mercies, and out of love to my soul has he granted them to me. O, you may go away with comfort in what you have, be it never so little that God has given you. O, the Lord has given you a good portion, your lot is fallen into a good ground, you have a goodly inheritance, certainly you have a child's portion, go away and be satisfied in it.

And now, my brethren, though this, in a practical point of view, is the chief, I confess I have not yet come to that which is held forth in the very words, and that is about the giving of governors in God's wrath; I only have spoken concerning the giving of our desires generally: but now, for the particular, specific object of their desires, that God had given them a king in his wrath; that I confess is a point in which there may be much of the mind of God known, and which would require some time in fully opening. It would be hard to speak of such a point as this is without very great deliberation, and to have full scope when at any time I speak of it; and therefore I do not intend at this time to meddle with this point of God's giving kings in wrath, I shall rather defer it to the next day. Only one note further, and that is this:

Many get from their consciences the gratification of their lusts, as they strive to obtain from God the objects of their desires. They are very violent in their desires, and would fain have God grant them such and such things; at length, though it be a thing very displeasing to God, he saith, Let them have it. Just so it is in regard of conscience, for conscience is God's vicegerent in the soul of man. Now many men are very desirous of things which their consciences at first strongly oppose. Oh, they would fain have such and such things: saith conscience. You may not, you will sin against God, you will wound me, and bring sorrow and affliction on yourselves. This makes them pause; they are very much grieved that their consciences will not sanction their desires, and it may be they are so far enlightened that they dare not act without their approbation: now, although they may restrain themselves for a while, yet still their lusts are very violent, and they would fain have their consciences to yield to them; they labour therefore and struggle with them, and seek to find out some evasions and distinctions whereby they may either lay them asleep, so that they may not trouble them, or at length to satisfy their consciences so far as to extort from them permission to gratify their desires. Now their lusts, when they are grown hot, send up such steams into their understandings as hinder the work of conscience, conscience begins to be more dull in its work, not so quick in the apprehensions of its duty, nor in the exercise of it, as before; and at length, after much ado, when they have tired and wearied themselves, and tired conscience too, they at length do obtain even of their very consciences such things as they have a mind to; so that now their consciences begin to say to them, Seeing you have such a strong and earnest desire, do it: they do it with all eagerness, blessing themselves, and thinking they have gotten a great victory in that they have prevailed on their consciences to sanction their pursuits. It may be these men will say, If I thought it were against conscience, if conscience did tell me that it ought not to be done, I would not do it for a world. Yea, but, friend, how do you obtain leave of your conscience? There was a time that conscience was opposed; how comes it now to sanction? is it not through the violence of your spirits? You would needs have it, you were set upon it that you must have your liberty and preferment, your ease and content, and you must not suffer such and such things, and by this violence of your spirits you succeeded in prevailing over your consciences: now conscience lets you go on; but remember, conscience will tear you for it another day: you have prevailed over it so that it does not accuse you of your evil ways, but lets you go on; do you think you will not hear of it another day? O yes, certainly conscience, being God's vicegerent, will do as God will do in this case: when men importune for their desires of God, Why, saith God, let them have them; but do not you think that God will call them to an account for it? so it is here. As men shall hereafter pay full dearly for those things which God suffers them to have here; so many will pay full dearly for those things which conscience now gives them liberty to enjoy: though you have liberty, yet it is a liberty forced from conscience, and conscience will have another reckoning with you hereafter. You know how it was with Balaam, he desired, because of his preferment, to go to curse Israel, and though God did deny him once, yet he would ask again, and would not be satisfied till God said, at length, Go; yea, but for all that God met him in the way, and had like to have destroyed him. Just so do many with their consciences; it may be they see some preferment that they may get in such a way, and their consciences for the present have some tenderness, but they will ask their consciences, and if their consciences say No, they will ask again and again; and as, I say, God said at length to Balaam, Go, but said it to him in anger, and met him in the way, and had like to have destroyed him; so, though conscience may suffer thee to serve thy desires, yet will it one day come out with a drawn sword against thee, and be perhaps thy destruction.

Notes prepared by the author for another sermon on ver. 11, which (being prevented by the Lord's taking him to himself) he preached not.

Ver. 11. I gave thee a king in mine anger, and took him away in my wrath.

Obs. 1. Kings and princes sometimes are given to a people in anger. Job xxiv. 30, "That the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be insnared." It is in anger if a hypocrite reign. Psal. cix. 6, "Set thou a wicked man over him: and let Satan stand at his right hand." Dan. viii. 23, 24, "In the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper." So it was said of the Agri-gentines, that Phalaris was given to them as a plague, and Marius to the Romans. Anastasius Nicenus, Quest. 15, in Script., speaks of one in the time of Phocas, pleading with God, and saying, Wherefore, Lord, hast thou made Phocas emperor? The answer from heaven was, Because I could not find a worse. He tells also of the bishop of Thebais, who, being proud because advanced, had these words spoken to him: Wherefore, miserable man, art thou proud? Thou wert not made bishop because thou wast worthy, but because the city deserved such a bishop.

But it may be demanded, When are kings and princes given in anger? I answer,

1. When men are eager upon them. The men of Shechem were eager upon Abimelech, Judg. ix. 6; they had him, but in wrath; for, ver. 23, it is said, "Then God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem." And what the issue was we know.

2. When kings and princes are desired out of an opposition to what God would have them to be under, as here in the text: so 1 Sam. viii. 10, 19.

3. When such are given as were Saul and Jeroboam. For explication of this, observe,

1. What Saul was.

1. Tyrannical. 1 Sam. viii. 11, compared with the title of Psal. xviii.

2. Bold and venturesome, to do things of his own head in God's worship. He sacrificed before Samuel came, 1 Sam. xiii. 9.

3. Hypocritical. He blessed Samuel, and pretended he had "performed the commandment of the Lord," 1 Sam. xv. 13; whereas he had rebelled against it, ver. 22, 23.

4. Rash. "Cursed," saith he, "be the man that catch any food until evening," 1 Sam. xiv. 24; which was, first, a hindrance to the execution of vengeance, ver. 29, 30; and again, all the people heard not, and he had like to have executed the curse on his son Jonathan, if the people had not rescued him.

5. Hardly convinced. He stands in the defence of himself against Samuel the prophet, 1 Sam. xv. 20.

6. Greedy of gain. Samuel charges him with flying upon the spoil, 1 Sam. xv. 19.

7. A respecter of the people more than of the commandment of God. "I feared the people," saith he, "and obeyed their voice," 1 Sam. xv. 24.

8. A seeker of his own vain honour. "I have sinned: yet honour me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel," 1 Sam. xv. 30.

9. Abandoned by God's Spirit. "But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him," 1 Sam. xvi. 14.

10. Of a poor low spirit to help himself when God was departed. When he was troubled with the evil spirit, he was fain to accept the poor help that music could afford him, 1 Sam. xvi. 17.

11. Subtle and crafty. David, speaking of Saul, saith, "They have prepared a net for my steps," "they have digged a pit before me," Psal. lvii. 6; cxlii. 3.

12. Proud and haughty. "For the sin of their mouth and the words of their lips let them even be taken in their pride," Psal. lix. 12. "Will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards," &c., 1 Sam. xxii. 7.

13. Given to cursing. "And for cursing and lying which they speak," Psal. lix. 12.

14. Envious. When they had sung in the dance, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands;" the text adds, "Saul was very wroth, and the saying displeased him;" "and Saul eyed David from that day and forward," 1 Sam. xviii. 6—9.

15. A hater of the saints. 1 Sam. xviii. 11, Saul cast his javelin at David, and said, "I will smite David even to the wall with it." And ver. 12, 13, "Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul. Therefore Saul removed him from him." And 1 Sam. xix. 1, "Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David." And ver. 17, he calls him his enemy, saying to Michal, "Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped?"

16. Cruel. 1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19, he caused to be slain eighty-five priests; and smote the city of Nob, (the city of the priests,) "men and women, children and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword." Psal. vii. 2, David prays for help, "lest he" (Saul) "tear my soul" (saith he) "like a lion, rending it in pieces." And Psal. lvii. 4, "My soul is among lions: and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword."

17. Treacherous: he pretends a benefit, intends a mischief. "And Saul said to David, Behold my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife: only be thou valiant for me, and fight the Lord's battles." For Saul said, Let not mine hand be upon him, but let the hand of the Philistines be upon him," 1 Sam. xviii. 17.

18. False of his word. "But it came to pass at the time when Merab Saul's daughter should have been given to David, that she was given unto Adriel the Meholahite to wife," 1 Sam. xviii. 19. And 1 Sam. xxvi. 21, Saul saith, "I have sinned: return, my son David: for I will no more do thee harm:" yet, chap. xxvii. 1, David was so pursued by him, that he fled to Achish king of Gath.

19. A disregarder of oaths. 1 Sam. xix. 6, "Saul swear, As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain;" yet, ver. 10, 11, he would have smitten him to the wall with his javelin, and missing that, he sent messengers to murder him in his house.

20. Stout against his conscience, and all the means which God used to reclaim him. 1 Sam. xxiv. 17—20, "Thou art more righteous than I," &c. "I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thy hand," &c. Hence David, Psal. lix., praying against Saul, as appears in the title of the Psalm, saith, ver. 5, "Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors."

21. A preferer of base men, and rejecter of good. David was his enemy, but Doeg a mighty man with him, 1 Sam. xxii. 18, 22.

22. He cares not for his own laws to satisfy his humours. Having suppressed wizards and witches, yet he seeks to them and promises them immunity, 1 Sam. xviii. 9, 10.

23. Unwearied in his malice. He never rests, but follows David, as one hunts a partridge, from place to place; if disappointed one way, he tries another; sends to David's house, then to Natioth, then to Keilah, then to Ziph, then to Engedi, to Hachilah: "Saul sought him every day," 1 Sam. xxiii. 14. "Behold, he travaileth with iniquity," Psal. vii. 14.

24. One that could not be overcome by kindness, love, faithfulness, &c., 1 Sam. xxiv. 4; xxvi. 8, 9.

25. Vexed because he could not have his mind. They "return, and make a noise like a dog," vexed to lose his morsel, Psal. lix. 14, 15.

26. Desperate in forsaking God, and going to the devil for counsel, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, and afterward willfully kills himself, 1 Sam. xxxi.

II. What Jeroboam was.

1. One that seemed to be much for the good of the people, but when he had power in his own hands, then none more fierce, 1 Kings xi. 27. He cared not for the people, Hos. xiii. 1.

2. One whose carriage was very taking, diligent, industrious, and valiant, a man fit for rule, 1 Kings xi. 28. But when he had got power into his own hands, there was nothing but imperious domineering; as Tacitus saith of Galba, All men judged him fit for rule, till he ruled.

Omnium consensus capax imperii, nisi imperasset.

3. One who subjected religion to policy. "And Jeroboam said in his heart, Now shall the kingdom return to the house of David, if this people go up to do sacrifice in the house of the Lord at Jerusalem. Whereupon the king took counsel, and made two calves of gold," &c., 1 Kings xii. 26—28.

4. False, pretending one thing, and meaning another. He said unto the people, "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem: behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," 1 Kings xii. 28.

5. Idolatrous. "But hast done evil above all that were before thee: for thou hast gone and made three other gods, and molten images," 1 Kings xiv. 9.

6. A conscience oppressor. He laid snares for those that went up to Jerusalem to worship, as was noted, Hos. ix. 8.

7. A scorner. "He stretched out his hand with scorn," Hos. vii. 5.

8. Subtle. He ordained such a feast as was at Jerusalem, made a house of high places, and priests, that all might be furnished like the worship at Jerusalem, 1 Kings xii. 31.

9. Intemperate. "In the day of our king the princes have made him sick with bottles of wine," Hos. vii. 5.

10. One who despised the true ministers of God and loved a base clergy. "Made priests of the lowest of the people," 1 Kings xii. 31.

11. Enraged against the servants of God, and God himself, when opposed. "And it came to pass, when king Jeroboam heard the saying of the man of God, which had cried against the altar in Beth-el, that he put forth his hand from the altar, saying, Lay hold on him," 1 Kings xiii. 4.

12. Extremely stout, notwithstanding such a hand of God upon him. "After this Jeroboam returned not from his evil way, but made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places," 1 Kings xiii. 33.

13. A sligher of God and his worship. "And hast cast me behind thy back," 1 Kings xiv. 9.

14. One who "did evil above all that were before him," 1 Kings xiv. 9.

15. One who trusted to his many men and policy, not regarding what is said to him about fighting against God, 2 Chron. xiii. 8, 12, 13.

16. One who, though conquered before God's servants, who relied on the Lord, so that he lost "five hundred thousand chosen men" at one time, yet continued in his evil, 2 Chron. xiii. 17.

17. One who for his own ends would make use of God's prophets, 1 Kings xiv.

18. A man of a base spirit. God threatens he will take his house away, "as a man taketh away dung," 1 Kings xiv. 10.

19. One whose family was such, that, except in one little child, there was found in it no "good thing toward the Lord God of Israel," 1 Kings xiv. 13.

20. One "who made Israel to sin." The common epithet the Scripture gives him.

21. One who ruined the kingdom by his sin. "He shall give Israel up because of the sins of Jeroboam," 1 Kings xiv. 16.

Yet for all this, "the days which Jeroboam reigned were two and twenty years," 1 Kings xiv. 20.

Seeing governors are sometimes given in wrath, let us pray that they be given to us in love. But there follows, "And took him away in my wrath." As if he should say, Though they were evil, yet I took them away, to make way for worse.

Obs. 2. Oppressors are taken away, and greater oppressors come in their room.

Calvin, thus, I will take away this kingdom from you, which I see to be an occasion of blindness to you; for if it remain, I shall be nobody with you, nor will my word be of any authority.

Obs. 3. What God gives in anger never prospers.

Expect not therefore help from those men or things that God gives in wrath.

Sometimes God accepts of repentance when it is unfeigned, as in David's taking Bathsheba to wife, of whom he had Solomon, &c.; viz. if the thing itself be good.

Obs. 4. What God gives in anger cannot hold long with us. Caution, yet this kingdom of Israel continued twenty years.

Obs. 5. Those things that begin ill, prosper not usually. Initium maledictum, finis maledictus, Calvin in loc. The beginning is accursed, and so is the end. Thus many things begun in anger, end in wrath: this kingdom of Israel is an example of this from the beginning to the end. [But yet here also that holds, which the author noted above, ver. 9, that no condition is so bad, but there is help in God for it, and if so be that the continuance in it be not with sin, or the thing a sin in itself.]

Obs. 6. When men have enjoyed their desires in wrath a while, God rends them in fury from them. This is terrible indeed, for as it was given in indignation, all the while it was enjoyed it was abused. "While the meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them," Psal. lxxviii. 30, 31.

But yet we must here note the difference which Parcus observes, That the calamities attendant on what God gives in displeasure, are indeed wrath to his own people, but to his enemies fury.

Obs. 7. God's removal of a wrathful gift, is often but an instance of more wrath.

But here are two questions: 1. How may we know when God takes away, and not in wrath?

1. When the comfort or creature which he takes from us, began to draw our heart from him, and it is seasonably removed to our sanctification. 2. When we can bless God and be thankful. 3. When God makes it up in himself, and in the comforts of his Spirit.

2. When does God take away a thing in wrath?

1. When it is given in anger.

2. When he takes it away by violence in some terrible manner. Psal. lviii. 9, "Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath." Psal. lii. 5, "God shall likewise destroy thee for ever, he shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling place, and root thee out of the land of the living." Lam. ii. 6, "He hath violently taken away his tabernacle;" as a man that is angry snatches away what he had given.

3. When he takes it in the hour of our need. Zeph. ii. 4, "They shall drive out Ashdod at noon day;" when they should have taken the benefit of their houses for shelter, and their meat for refreshment.

4. When we murmur and complain inordinately of our affliction.

5. When we shift and shirk out for succour.

6. When there is nothing but bitterness, and only evil in the removal.

7. When one evil makes way to another evil, and none are sanctified. "He made a way to his anger," Psal. lxxviii. 50.

8. When the deprivation carries with it the marks of special sins; yea, when the sin itself is allowed to deprive us of a mercy: as when intemperance takes away health; ambition brings into disgrace; covetousness takes away riches. "This is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins," Rom. xi. 27.

9. When it happens according to those misgiving thoughts which we have had, and to which yet we would not give heed.

10. When it brings sin into remembrance. "Thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth," Job xiii. 26. "Art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?" 1 Kings xvii. 18.

Wherefore seeing this is so fearful, let us pray, with David, "O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure," Psal. vi. 1.

Obs. 8. Whether we have our desires, or whether they be taken away, yet still all may be in wrath. To this state our sins may bring us.

Obs. 9. Change of oppressing government by foreign power, is a sign of wrath.

Obs. 10. God's hand in a business excuses not man's sin; he can make use of man's sin to the furtherance of his ends, and yet be innocent.

Obs. 11. We must judge of nothing by success.

Samaria's Downfal;

OR

A C O M M E N T A R Y,

BY WAY OF SUPPLEMENT,

ON THE FIVE LAST VERSES OF THE

THIRTEENTH CHAPTER OF HOSEA ;

WHEREIN IS SET FORTH,

EPHRAIM'S DIGNITY, DUTY, IMPENITENCY, AND DOWNFAL.

VERY SUITABLE TO, AND SEASONABLE FOR, THESE PRESENT TIMES.

WHERE YOU HAVE THE TEXT EXPLAINED, SUNDRY CASES OF CONSCIENCE CLEARED, MANY PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS RAISED, WITH REFERENCES TO SUCH AUTHORS AS CLEAR ANY POINT MORE FULLY.

BY THOMAS HALL, B. D.

PASTOR OF KING'S NORTON.

Thus will I do unto thee, O Israel: and because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel.—AMOS iv. 12.
A prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself.—PROV. xxii. 3.

Etsi Christus et apostoli minantur facinorosis, et graviter reprehendunt vitia; tamen prophetarum conciones ideo ad deterrendos malos aptiores, et ad timorem Dei inculcandum efficaciores sunt, quia semper certas pœnas flagitiosorum addunt, quas eventus postea ostendit non fuisse vanas.—LUTHER. in Præfat. ad Hoseam.

TO THE

RENOWNED CITY OF LONDON,

GRACE, MERCY, AND PEACE, BE MULTIPLIED.

A WORD spoken in season is much commended by the wisest of men, Prov. xv. 23, and xxv. 11. Yea, it is made one of Christ's excellencies, that he had "the tongue of the learned," that he should "know how to speak a word in season," Isa. l. 4. Such words are not only profitable, but also powerful, and carry abundance of convincing strength and force with them, Job vi. 25. This, principally, has imboldened me to dedicate this treatise to you. Had I searched for five verses throughout the whole Bible, I could hardly have found five together (all things considered) more suitable and seasonable for the present times.

In them we have an alarm for the drowsy, a corrosive for the impenitent, a cordial for the penitent, and many quickening considerations to move us all to a speedy preparing to meet our God in a way of unfeigned humiliation, before the decree bring forth, and the fierce anger of the Lord seize upon us.

Here we may see Ephraim's dignity, and Ephraim's downfall, and those sins which helped to bring him down; and in him we may read England's condition. The Lord has made us his Ephraim, he has laid his right hand upon us, he has made us the head of the tribes, he has set us above, when for our sins he might long since have laid us in the dust. Ephraim's sins were Ephraim's ruin; and if those sins be found in England which were found in him, what can we expect but the like judgments? for God is the same to the same sinners. If Samaria's sins be found in London, London must look for Samaria's judgments. God will not spare sin, wherever he finds it, be it in city or country. Sin has brought down greater cities than yours; as they had their times of rising, so of ruining; as of building, so of burning: witness Nineveh, No, Tyre, Babylon, and Jerusalem, sin has made them all a desolation. For my own part, I shall never expect that city or state should prosper, till God's church prosper; or that our houses should continue, when God's house lies waste; all our buildings will be but Nods and Babels, that is, unsettlement and confusion, till God's house be settled and exalted amongst us, Hag. i. 4—11. The sins of England I fear more than all the enemies in the world. It is not Spain or Italy, it is not France or Turkey, that I fear; though all nations should compass us about, yet were we but an obedient people, I should not doubt but that in the name of the Lord we should destroy them. But it is the atheism, heresy, blasphemy, security, impenitency, apostacy, profanation of holy things, formality, hypocrisy, unrighteousness, division, and contempt of the gospel; these, even these, are the enemies that I fear; and if any thing destroy us, it is these abominations that reign amongst us. "Be thou instructed," therefore, O England, and thou, O London, the chief city thereof, lest the Lord's "soul depart from thee," and thou be made "desolate, a land not inhabited," Jer. vi. 8. God has borne long with our provocations, but he will not always bear, but will at last reconcile his patience with the fierceness of his fury. Let not therefore Satan delude any, as if these were but some melancholy conceits, some fearful fancies, or vain prognostications of some lying astrologers; but know, that these are certain assertions, grounded upon the infallible word of God, whose threatenings, as well as promises, are like to silver, that has been seven times purified, and thoroughly tried, Psal. xii. 6.

True, we have many privileges that others want, but no privileges can preserve an impenitent people from ruin: Jerusalem was highly privileged, and had the choicest preaching, a little before its downfall. The sins of a city and nation may be so great, that though Noah, Job, and Daniel (three men that could do very much with God, Ezek. xiv. 14) should stand before the Lord for them, yet they shall not prevail for a hardened, apostatizing people. Where such spiritual judgments go before, temporal judgments always follow, Isa. vi. 9—12. Sinning is worse than suffering; better see a people bleeding, than blaspheming; for by our sufferings God is glorified, but by our sins he is dishonoured.

We are a people that are much for liberty, we cannot endure a yoke; no, though it be Christ's easy yoke, yet we will not have him to reign over us; we will not serve him with gladness and singleness of heart in the abundance of all things, and therefore he may justly make us serve our enemies in the want of all things, Deut. xxviii. 47, 48. And as we are all for liberty, so he may justly proclaim a liberty for us to the sword, pestilence, and famine, Jer. xxxiv. 17.

God has humbled many in your great city, by sickness, poverty, and decay of trading, &c.; but have you been made humble thereby? He has sent the choicest of his ministers amongst you, and fed you (in a spiritual sense) with the finest of the wheat; but have you answered God's cost and care? and are you bettered by all his dispensations to you? Have you heard the voice of the rod, and who hath appointed it? or have you not rather fallen away more and more, and grown worse and worse? if so, how can you expect peace, when your apostacies and spiritual fornications are so many? 2 Kings ix. 17, 18.

But it is not for me to counsel you, who have so many living and dead counsellors at hand; I shall therefore betake myself to prayer, desiring that the good-will of Him that dwelt in the bush may dwell amongst you, that he would be for walls and bulwarks to you, and your glory in the midst of you; that he, by the Spirit of fire and of burning, would purge out of you every thing that offends, that your scum of blasphemy, heresy, hypocrisy, unrighteousness, &c., may no longer abide in you, but that the name of your great and famous city may for ever be Jehovah Shammah, The Lord is there. This is and shall be the prayer of

Your servant in the Lord,

THOMAS HALL.

King's Norton, Nov. 17, 1659.

---

TO THE READER.

HAVING occasion lately to peruse Mr. Burroughs on Hosea xiii. 13, I found that his commentary was defective, and that Mr. Burroughs (that prince of preachers) died before he had finished the chapter; whereupon I perused the remainder of the chapter, and finding it to be very pertinent to these present drowsy, dangerous times, and that no man had set upon it these twelve years, (for so long has Mr. Burroughs been dead,) having a little respite, in the strength of my God I undertook it, and by his assistance have at last completed it. True, it has cost me some pains, the most of these five verses being so turned and tortured, so intricate and perplex, admitting of so many various lections and senses, and interpreters so divided amongst themselves, that he had need of a great deal of prayer and patience that undertakes them. I think there are not many harder verses in the Bible than some of these, yet by a good hand of Providence I have gone through them, and have not balked any known difficulty, but have made all as plain and intelligible as possibly I could.

Many posthumous works have had supplements excelling their predecessors; this cannot be expected here. All that I can promise thee is this, that I have as fully and faithfully explained the text as I could. I have raised thence many useful observations, and given references (because I understand they are very acceptable to many) to such as enlarge upon any point more fully. Some common places are succinctly handled, and if any controversy occur, (according to my custom and calling,) they have a lash and a pass.

As for the fourteenth chapter, it is piously and pithily opened by two very grave, judicious men; so that now you have the whole prophecy completed. If thou reap any benefit, give God the praise, who is pleased to show light in the darkness, and strength in the weakness, of Thine in the Lord,

THOMAS HALL.

CHAPTER XIII.

VERSE 12.

The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up; his sin is hid.

THIS chapter contains the sum of the eleventh sermon of Hosea, wherein the prophet (like the sweet singer of Israel) treats both of judgment and mercy, and uses both drawing and driving motives (one or both of which usually work upon all ingenuous dispositions) to bring them to repentance. And since God has ordained the law to make way for the gospel, and humiliation to go before consolation, therefore the prophet denounces,

1. Judgments against Israel, and specially that of the sword, which should cut off his kings, destroy his kingdom, take away all their pleasant things, and make them a desolation: neither was God to be blamed for all this, for it was their own sins that had brought those evils upon them, viz. their idolatry, pride, carnal confidence, impenitence, stupidity, ingratitude, and forgetfulness of that God, who had raised them to great glory and dignity.

2. He sets forth the fierceness of God's wrath against them, ver. 7, 8. Great blessings when abused bring great judgments. Their sins had turned God, their great Benefactor, into a "lion," "a leopard," "a bear bereaved of her whelps," "a wild beast;"* and imbittered his soul against them. They dreamt they should find him a God all mercy; he tells them they are mistaken, for now they should find him a God full of fury.

3. Whereas they might think to escape because God had so long forborne them, the prophet, by a prolepsis, prevents this conceit: "The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, his sin is hid;" that is, Ephraim thinks now he may take his pleasure, since his iniquity lies hid, and he has so long escaped; but mark what follows, ver. 13, "The sorrows of a travelling woman shall come upon him." As the pleasure of conception has the pangs of child-birth attending it, so this secure and pleasant people shall certainly meet with sorrow in the end; and therefore Ephraim is but "an unwise son," and guilty of great folly, in that he does not speedily make his peace with God.

4. Lest they should despair, he intermixes comfort with his threatenings, and allays the terrors of the law with the promises of the gospel, ver. 14.

5. Yet, lest they should grow secure, after a little interruption in the order of the words, he returns to denounce judgments, and tells them, that notwithstanding the promise of deliverance, yet first they must expect a desolation of the chief city and the kingdom, ver. 15, 16.

In this 12th verse we have briefly set forth the desperate and deplorable condition of God's people; they were come to that height of wickedness, and grown so stupid under God's strokes, that now they must expect no more pardon, nor look that God should bear any longer with them. So that in these words the Lord meets with the vain conceits of the loose persons of those times, who soothed themselves in their evil ways, and because the Lord suspended his judgments for a time, therefore they never apprehended them, but thought that the Lord was such a one as themselves, that is, no way displeased with their sins; but since he connived at them, they concluded he slept, and took no notice of them, but had utterly forgotten them. But they are much deceived, saith the Lord, for I have seen all their wickedness, and have sealed up all their sins till the due time of revealing them (which is now at hand) be come. It is true, I have borne long with them; let that offend none, for I have not forgotten their provocations, they are all bound up so that not one of them shall be lost, but they shall dearly reckon for them all together. As God has "a book of remembrance" wherein he records the good deeds of his people, which shall one day be published to their everlasting praise, Mal. iii. 16; so he has a book of remembrance wherein he records the wickedness of the wicked, which shall ere long be published to their everlasting shame. As the sin of Judah was "written with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond," so that it should not easily be blotted out, Jer. xvii. 1; so all the sins of Ephraim, from the time of Jeroboam's reign to their going into captivity, were bound up and sealed, that they might not be lost. Papers that lie loose and unbound are scattered with every wind, but when they are fast bound up and sealed, then they are safe and sure. Money that lies at random is lost, but that which is locked up in coffers is safe, and will be brought forth when need requires. So God had not forgotten Ephraim's sin, but had hid and sealed it up till the determined time to punish him was come; he had locked it up in his memory for a day of reckoning.

* Deus comparatur leoni saevo, quo nulla bestia truculentior. 2. Pardo in via observanti, quo nulla subtilior. 3. Urso catulis orbato, quo nulla saevior. 4. Cuius immani bestia,

Yet, to leave no clod unbroken that we may find out the golden ore, I shall give you the grammatical reading of the words; for a good foundation is the strength of the building.

"The iniquity," עון the pravity and perverseness, the prevarication and crookedness, of Ephraim's ways is laid up.

"Of Ephraim." Ephraim was Joseph's second son, but it is here put for the ten tribes of Israel, of which Ephraim was one of the chiefest; so Hos. iv. 17; v. 3; vi. 4; vii. 8, 11; and their first king after the division was an Ephraimite.

"Is bound up." צורה The metaphor here implies special care and custody, and is borrowed from the men of the world, who are careful to lock up their money that it be not lost. The like expressions you may read, Deut. xxxii. 34; Job xiv. 17; xxi. 19; Lam. i. 14. So the iniquity of Ephraim was sealed and kept safe, to be brought forth in due time as a charge against him. Though men scatter their sins abroad and forget them, yet God bundles them up and remembers them; and as pardoning grace does loose the sinner, so sin unpardoned is said to be bound up and reserved for punishment, Matt. xvi. 19.

"His sin." הפסא The punishment of his sin. It is a frequent metonymy to put sin for the punishment of sin. So Lev. xx. 20; Numb. xii. 11; Ezek. iv. 4—6. Peccatum ejus, from Chata, to err, or wander from the mark: such is sin; it is a wandering and going astray from the law of God, it is an erring from the mark which we should always aim at, viz. the glory of God and our own salvation.

siqua alia, prioribus immanior, sub genere continetur. Terrenovius in loc.

צורה gavit, custodivit, construxit quasi in fastidium; Ia Gen. xlii. 35; 1 Sam. xxv. 29; Prov. xii. 22; Ass. 4.

“Is hid.” Not from God, but with God; it is laid up by him for a day of reckoning, when the Lord shall pour out the fierceness of his wrath on Israel. So that their sin is hid, not in merey, but in judgment; not for protection, but for desolation. “Samaritania shall become desolate.” God lays up the sins of the wicked in store against a day of wrath, when he intends to punish them for all together, Rom. ii. 5.

Obs. 1. God is wondrous patient, and bears long with sinners. He is many years in laying men's sins up in his treasury. He does not immediately cut off sinners, nor always destroy wicked men in the act of sin, as he might do, (for so many sins as men commit, so many damnations they deserve,) but with much patience, and great long-suffering, he bears with “the vessels of wrath,” Rom. ix. 22. He bore with the old world many hundred years, even till the whole earth was corrupt before him, and his Spirit tired out, as it were, with striving with them, Gen. vi. 3; 1 Pet. iii. 20. He spared Sodom so long that their sins cried to heaven for vengeance against them, Gen. xviii. 20, 21. He spared Amalek, too, four hundred years, 1 Sam. xv. 2, 3. He spared Israel here three hundred and sixty years ere he sent them into captivity, Ezek. iv. 4—6. He spared the Gentiles four thousand years, Acts xv. 16, and bore with Jerusalem till they stoned his prophets, and would not be reclaimed, Matt. xxiii. 37. His vials of wrath are vessels of large extent, but narrow mouths; they pour out slowly, but drench deeply, and distil effectually God's wrath on the heads of his enemies, Rev. xvi. 1, 18, 19. Though we provoke him daily, yet he is patient towards us, “not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance,” 2 Pet. iii. 9; Rev. ii. 21. He sends his messengers in great compassion to us, “rising early” to stop us in our sinful courses, and so prevent our destruction, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15; Jer. xxv. 4. Yea, he is not only patient, but “long-suffering,” which is a further degree of patience, it is patience lengthened out, Exod. xxxiv. 6; Psal. ciii. 8; Jonah iv. 2. He waits, and waits long for our returning, crying, “Wilt thou not be made clean? when shall it once be?” Jer. xiii. 27. Were some good man to sit but one hour in the throne of God, and look down upon the earth, as God does continually, and see what abominable idolatries, blasphemies, heresies, homicides, perjuries, adulteries, persecutions, oppressions, were committed in that hour, he would undoubtedly in the next set all the world on fire. It is well, in this respect, that we have to do with God, and not with man. “I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger, I will not return to destroy Ephraim.” Why so? “For I am God,” most true in my promises, and of infinite patience, “and not man,” who is mutable and passionate, and could not bear the daily indignities and provocations which are committed against me, Hos. xi. 9. Great then is the sin of those who abuse the patience and long-suffering of the Lord, adding sin to sin, and drunkenness to thirst; that draw on iniquity with the cords of vanity, and so treasure up wrath against the day of wrath. Impunity breeds in them impenitency; “Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil,” Eccl. viii. 11. Every word has its weight; these indulged sinners do not barely practise sin, but their heart is set on it; the very bent of their spirit is to evil indefinitely, that is, to all manner of evil, and that with resolution and purpose of heart, they follow it fully. As good men cleave to God and his ways with “purpose of heart,” Acts xi. 23, and are married to him, Cant. ii. 16, so do these to sin and Satan, they are married to them, Hos. iv. 17. Impunity and prosperous wickedness make men insolent, Psal. lxxiii. 8, 9, impudent, Isa. iii. 9. And resolute in sin, Jer. xlv. 16, 17. Such are apt to think there is no God, or at least that he regards not things below; or that he is like themselves, approving of their ways, and that which they do is no sin, Psal. l. 16—22. Those gross hypocrites, that talked so much of God's word, but denied him in their works, being slanderers, adulterers, thieves, thought that because God was silent, and did not presently punish them, that therefore he approved of their wickedness. But mark what follows, there is a stinging but, “but I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes.” Thou shalt know one day how I hated thy sins, by the punishments which I will inflict upon thee for them; and though now thou hidest them, yet then I will marshal them and set them in rank and order before thy face. Consider this, therefore, you that cast God's counsels behind your backs, and hate to be reformed, before he awaken your drowsy consciences, and rouse up that mastiff which lies sleeping in your bosoms, before you come to answer for all in the midst of flames. It is a sad and sore delusion wherewith Satan deceives millions of men, that because they are not presently punished, therefore they shall never be punished; and since God has forborne so long, therefore he will always bear, and they shall never hear more of their sins; hence it is that the wicked flatter themselves in their sins, Deut. xxix. 19; Psal. xxxvi. 1, 2; Isa. xlvii. 7.

Obs. 2. God's forbearance is no acquittance; though he bear long, yet he will not always bear. We see he bore long with the old world, Sodom, Jerusalem, &c., but at last they paid for all. Mercy abused turns into fury, and the preservations of wicked men are but reservations to greater wrath. God has leaden heels, but iron hands; the further he fetches his arm, the heavier will the blow come; the further he draws his arrow, the deeper will it wound. God's mill may grind soft and slow, but it grinds sure and small, and he will recompense his patience with the fierceness of his fury, Nah. i. 3, 6. Ever after the sweetmeats of sin, look for a sad and sour reckoning. There was never any that sinned against the Lord, be it never so secretly or subtly contrived, but first or last the punishment of his sin found them out, Gen. iv. 7; Numb. xxxii. 23. As parents let their children alone till, after multiplied faults, they have committed some signal one, and then reckon with them for all together; so the Lord lets the wicked alone till they be ripe for ruin, Gen. xv. 16, and have filled up the measure of their sin, that wrath may come upon them to the uttermost, Amos i. 3, 6, 9, 11, 13. The whore of Babylon, that has so long made herself drunk with the blood of the saints, shall at last be burnt with fire; yea, it is said she is fallen already, to show the certainty of it, Rev. xiv. 8. God will avenge the injuries done to his church, though it he long first, Luke xviii. 6. When God has long held his peace, and been still, then he will cry suddenly, “like a travelling woman,” and “will destroy and devour at once,” Isa. xlii. 14.

Now, the Lord show mercy to England, and awaken us out of our deep security, for we have been a people that have exceedingly abused the patience and long-suffering of our God; as he has loaded us with mercies, so we have loaded him with our iniquities; we have made him to wait with our sins, and broken his heart with our abominations, Ezek. vi. 9. As we have been increased, so have we sinned against him; the more victories and success we have had, the more blasphemous and licentious we have been. Do we thus requite the Lord, O foolish and unwise? Is this the thanks we render to God for above a hundred years' preaching? Shall not the Lord visit for such sins as these, and will not his soul be avenged on such a nation as this? True, the Lord has borne long with us, but he will not always bear; but as he said to Ephraim here, so may I say to England, The iniquity of England is bound up, and her sin is hid till a meet time of punishment is come, which we have cause to fear is now at hand; and then God will reckon with us for all together, as we do with rebellious children. Remember your covenant-breaking, saith God. Item, Take this for your blasphemies, and that for your adulteries; take this for your heresies, and that for your atheism and apostacy; take this for your intolerable tolerations, and that for your reviling my messengers.

Obs. 3. This is a special device of Satan, first to tempt men to sin, and then to security in sin. To this end he persuades them they may do well enough; though they have done thus and thus, yet they shall hear no more of it. Thus he deluded our first parents; first he tempts them to sin, and then goes about to persuade them that they shall not die, nor be punished for their sin, Gen. iii. 4. He labours to free men from fear, that so they may be free to sin. In good things he separates the means from the end, and in evil he separates the end from the means. Thus this great deceiver of the whole world blinds men and deludes them, persuading them that what they have done, either is no sin, or if it be a sin, yet it is but a small one; or if it be a great one, yet it is not known; or if it be known, yet it shall never be punished. Thus seducers and false prophets, those devils incarnate, devils clothed with flesh and blood, like their father the devil, curse where God blesses, and bless where God curses. They daub over men's sins, and sew pillows under men's elbows, persuading men that the evils threatened shall never come, but they shall have peace, though God has said there is no peace to the wicked, 2 Kings ix. 18; Jer. viii. 11. Hence the apostle warns us thrice to take heed that no man deceive us with vain words, making us believe that we may be idolaters, covetous, fornicators, &c., and never be punished for it, 1 Cor. vi. 9; Gal. vi. 7; Eph. v. 6. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked;" you may, by your shifts, distinctions, and evasions, delude yourselves, and delude others; but there is no deluding God, who knows us better than we know ourselves. Carnal hiding of sin hinders the prosperity of the sinner, Prov. xxviii. 13; the more men hide them in this kind, the more God will reveal them; as we see in Saul, Achan, and David; what means did each of them use to cover his iniquity, but all in vain, for God brought it to the public view of all, 2 Sam. xii. 12. The only way to have our sins hid indeed, is plainly and sincerely to confess them, Psal. xxxii. 5.

Obs. 4. It is a sore punishment to go unpunished for sin. When the Lord was angry with Ephraim, he bids "let him alone," and tells him that he will not punish him for his sin, Hos. iv. 14, 17; that is, Since Ephraim will go after idols, after idols he shall go, I will not by any punishment restrain him, but I will let him go on and prosper in his abominations to his utter confusion; and thus to be given up to one's own heart's lust, is a sign of God's highest displeasure. In this sense not to be stricken is the sorest stroke, Isa. I. 5, and for God not to be angry is the greatest anger; as to be stopped and corrected for sin is the greatest mercy, Psal. lxxxix. 32—34; xciv. 12, 13.

Obs. 5. Punishment is never nearer than when it is least feared. A great calm many times is the fore-runner of a storm. When men cry, "Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them," 1 Thess. v. 3. When the old world was eating, drinking, buying, building, marrying, and sleeping in security, then comes the flood. When Agag thought "Surely the bitterness of death is past," saith Samuel, Hew him in pieces, 1 Sam. xv. 32, 33. When men are at ease in Zion, a woe hangs over their heads, Amos vi. 1—8. When men look upon judgments as afar off, then God will defer no longer, Ezek. xii. 27, 28. Secure Laish becomes a booty to its enemies, Judg. xviii. 7, 27. The Amalekites, when they had taken Ziklag and were drunken, fearing no danger, were suddenly surprised and slain, 1 Sam. xxx. 16, 17. When the Philistines met to be merry and sport themselves with Samson, he brings the house upon their heads, Judg. xvi. 25, 29. Darius, in the midst of his cups was slain by the Persians, Dan. v. 30. And Babylon, that boasted she sat as a queen and should see no sorrow, had sudden plagues come on her, Rev. xviii. 7, 8.

* Nemo sit deterius quia Deus est melior, toties delinquendo, quoties ignoscitur; quid enim indignus quam ex divina misericordia desmere argumentum ad divinam justitiam pro-

Let no man then delude himself with the thoughts of impunity; for though conscience may sleep for a time, yet at last it will be awakened, and then the longer thy sins have been hid, the more will they rage against thee, especially at the day of judgment, that day of revealing the hidden work of darkness. God will then "bring every work to judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil," Eccl. xii. 14. God will then unlock his treasury, and those sins which are now sealed up shall be brought to open light; and those secret villainies which men would not have exposed for all the world, shall be written as with a beam of the sun upon their foreheads to their everlasting shame. Sinners shall then have no cause to say, "Where is the God of judgment?" Mal. ii. 17.

Let us therefore make a right use and improvement of the patience of God,* let it melt and humble us, and lead us to repentance. Let us, in this our day, know the things that belong to our everlasting peace, whilst the patience of God yet waits upon us, and he stands knocking at the door of our hearts, Rev. iii. 20, before the door of grace be shut against us, for then it will be too late. To quicken you, know that God in the end will reckon with you for all his patience and forbearance; the longer he has borne with you, the greater will your sin be. He takes an exact account of every day and year that he has borne with us; "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation," Psal. xc. 10. He takes notice of every provocation; "They have tempted me now these ten times," Numb. xiv. 22: though you forget your provocations, yet God does not. Yea, he records every sermon that we hear, and the day and year that it was preached to us, Hag. i. 1.

Lastly, let us imitate God, and be followers of him as dear children, be patient as he is patient. Though we cannot be so by way of equality, yet by way of analogy and resemblance, in our degree and measure, we may and must: if he bear with us, we may well bear with our brethren; if he has forgiven us pounds, we may well forgive them pence. We should be "kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us," Eph. iv. 32; Col. iii. 13. Let our moderation and quietness of mind be made known to all, Phil. iv. 5; and if any man wrong us, let us melt them with our kindnesses, Rom. xii. 20, as David melted Saul, and made him weep, and confess that he was more righteous than himself. Even nature could say, It becomes a noble spirit to pass by injuries. When one told King John that his deady enemy was buried there, and advised him to deface his monument; No, said the king, but I wish all the rest of mine enemies were as honourably buried. It was an excellent answer of Chrysostom to the Empress Eudoxa, and savoured of a sweet, mortified frame of spirit. If the queen (said he) will banish me, let her banish me; "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." If she will saw me asunder, let her do it, the prophet vocandam, et quia Deus libenter excipit penitentes, data opera velle fieri peccatores? Tertul. de Pœnit. c. 7.

Aristot. Rhetor. l. 1. c. 14.

Isaiah suffered as much. If she will, let her cast me into the sea, and there will I remember Jonah.

Ver. 13. The sorrows of a travailing woman shall come upon him: he is an unwise son; for he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children.

In this verse the prophet goes on to denounce judgments against an obstinate and rebellious people, if by any means he might awaken them out of their security.

By the sorrows of a woman in travail, he sets forth the sudden, sure, and sore destruction, which was even now coming upon the heads of those carnally-confident sinners. They promised themselves peace and prosperity, they had made a league with death, and had put the evil day far from their souls, and therefore drew near to iniquity, Amos vi. 3; no words nor warnings, no mercies nor judgments, could work upon them; therefore the Lord resolves to bear no longer with them, but speedily to surprise them with his judgments. "The sorrows of a travailing woman shall come upon him."

In this verse we have, I. A commination, or a judgment threatened, set forth by the similitude of the sorrows of a travailing woman; a metaphor very frequent in Scripture, wherein are set forth sudden, sharp, inevitable sorrows.

1. Pangs upon a woman in travail come suddenly and unexpectedly; sometimes whilst they are eating, drinking, sleeping, playing, and think not of the pains of travail: so the Lord threatens to bring upon this stupid people calamities which should be like the sorrows of a travailing woman, sudden and unexpected.

2. The pains of a woman in travail are sharp, exquisite, and extreme sorrows, the bitterness whereof that sex can witness.

Such pangs the Scripture often makes the emblems of extreme anguish and distress, Psal. xlviii. 6; Isa. xxvi. 17, 18; xxxvii. 3; Jer. vi. 24; xxii. 23; xlix. 24; Micah iv. 9, 10; Gal. iv. 19. So the calamities which were coming upon this people were not slight sorrows, but such as brought desolation with them. 2. The longer a dead birth is concealed and carried in the womb, the more dangerous and difficult is the travail. Ephraim had for a long time concealed his sin, and therefore now his pangs are like to be so much the more grievous. 3. If the birth be living, the greater the birth, and the longer they go with it, the sharper are the pangs. So the longer God bears with a people, and the more his patience is abused, the more terrible will his wrath be.

3. Inevitable and irresistible. There is no escaping when once the time of travail is come. Cum adest hora, non datur mora. So the set time of Ephraim's calamities was now at hand, which they should in no wise be able to avert or avoid.

II. A reason for this commination, taken from the folly of Ephraim; he is, and, for aught I see, for ever will be, "an unwise son," which appears in his stupidity and obstinate persisting in his sins, without any striving to get out of them by repentance. Ephraim is "an unwise son," for had he been wise he had not staid so long in the birth.

Let Ephraim should reply, that a travailing woman is soon delivered, her pain may be sharp, but it is but short, she has hope not only of an end, but also of a birth, the joy whereof maketh her remember her anguish no more, John xvi. 21; the prophet proceeds, Ephraim "is an unwise son; for he should not stay long in the place of the breaking forth of children." Ephraim "is an unwise son," that sticks long in the birth, and so will be the death both of himself and his mother. He uses no means to facilitate the birth, or to help himself by passing through the strait gate of repentance. God stands over him, stretching forth his hands all the day long to wash off his filth, but he had no mind to come out of his filth, or to be washed from his wickedness, Ezek. xvi. 4, 9; rather than endure the pangs of regeneration, he will venture to stay a while though he be stifled for his pains. As if the prophet should say, Were Ephraim wise he would humble himself, and make his peace with God, that he might, by his mercy, be delivered fully from his miserable straits. If he were not utterly stiffened, or rather mad, he would take notice of God's judgments impending over him, and would imitate little infants, who strive to free themselves out of the straits and dangers of the birth. So would Ephraim have endeavoured to free himself by true repentance. But alas! so besotted and hardened is he in his sins, that he rests content with his carnal condition, never once striving or desiring to come out of this darkness into light, or to be brought from under the power of Satan unto God.

So that in these words the prophet notably inveighs against the stupidity and folly of God's people, in that they had rather be stifled in the filth of their sins, lie in the mouth of death, and under the pressures of God's wrath, to the destruction both of themselves and the church, (which he had before compared to a mother, Hos. ii. 2,) than extricate themselves out of this sin and misery by true repentance.

Obs. 1. Where sin precedes, sudden, certain, sharp, inevitable sorrows always follow. In the former part of the chapter we read of Ephraim's idolatry, pride, impenitency, &c.; now follows, "The sorrows of a travailing woman shall come upon him." Sin and punishment are inseparable companions, Gen. iv. 7, 14; xix. 15; Numb. xxxii. 23; Deut. xxviii. 15—68; hence the word which we render iniquity, signifies also pain and sorrow, because the workers of iniquity bring pain and sorrow upon their own heads, Job xxi. 19; Psal. xxxiii. 10.

How then should we hate sin with a pure and perfect hatred! not only odio inimicitia, but also odio aversationis; hate it so as to turn from it. This is the cause of all our sorrows; we may thank our sins for all our sickness, pains, and plagues, Lam. iii. 39. We should therefore do by our sins, as the Jews did by Paul (whom they looked upon as their enemy); "when they saw him in the temple, they stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him, crying out, Men of Israel, help: This is the man, that teacheth all men everywhere against the people, and the law, and this place," Acts xxi. 27, 28. So should we encourage each other against sin, and lay violent hands upon it, saying, Men and brethren, help: this is it that destroys our people, lays waste our cities, opposes the law, defiles our duties, and incenses the Most High against us.

Let us therefore purge it out of our understandings, and mortify it in our affections. Considering,

(1.) What sin is in its own nature. It is poison, dung, vomit, filth, folly, madness, darkness, sickness, destruction, death. It turned angels into devils, men into beasts, light into darkness, life into death, and order into confusion.

(2.) What sin is in respect of God. It is a reproach and a contempt of him, 2 Sam. xii. 9; it is blasphemy, rebellion, enmity, Rom. viii. 7.

Obs. 2. Scripture language is modest. The mouth of the matrix is called "the place of the breaking forth of children." Thus Adam is said to know Eve; and David to go in to Bathsheba: and so adultery is called "stolen waters," Prov. ix. 17. The Holy Ghost knowing the power of our corruption, and how apt we are to be fired with filthy speeches, therefore, by euphemisms, puts seemly titles on unseemly things. The Scriptures not only command chaste and modest things, but they also speak chastely and modestly of those things.

Abominable then is the sin of the popish casuists, who speak so grossly of the secrets of women in their cases on the seventh commandment. By their obscene words they corrupt good manners, and rather incite than suppress sin. If men must answer for "every idle word," much more for sinful and inmodest ones.

Obs. 3. It is a point of great folly to lie long under convictions, and yet never proceed to thorough conversion. The world is full of such unwise Ephraims, that are of a Laodicean temper, neither hot nor cold, that halt between two, or rather twenty, opinions. Their hearts are divided between God and the world, God and their idols, Hos. x. 2. They have their understandings enlightened, their affections stirred, and they are strongly convinced of the truth and comfort that are in God's ways, and yet there they "stay," they never proceed to a thorough conversion. They are almost, but not altogether, persuaded to be Christians; and so shall be almost, but not altogether, saved, Acts xxvi. 28. God has brought them to the birth, and there they stay, refusing to come forth. He would cure them, but they will not be cured; he would convert them, but they will not be converted, Jer. li. 9. Many have a name to live, and are not far from the kingdom of heaven, they come even to "the place of the breaking forth of children," but there they "stay long," too long. They were never fully brought off from their vain principles and practices, and therefore when a temptation comes, they return to them again, as the dog to his vomit.

Many go far, very far, so that they hear the word with some kind of faith and affection, with sorrow and joy, reforming many things, performing many good duties, both publicly and privately; being endowed with excellent gifts of knowledge, utterance, praying, and preaching, and shows of many graces, to the deceiving of themselves and many others; as Balaam, Saul, Ahab, Jehu, Herod, Judas, Demas, Ananias and Sapphira, and those apostates mentioned Heb. vi. 4—6; and yet for want of sincerity they lose all. It is said of king Joash, that he smote the ground twice or thrice and then stayed; whereupon the prophet was angry with him, saying, "Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times; then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it," 2 Kings xiii. 18, 19. So many a man begins well, and subdues two or three lusts, it may be, but for want of thorough work in subduing them all, loses all. A man may go within a mile of some famous city, and yet for want of going that mile never come there. A man may bid within a shilling of some good bargain, and yet for want of that shilling lose it. The people of Israel went as far as Kadesh-barnea, and were within eleven day's journey of Canaan; and yet by reason of their sins many of them perished in the wilderness and never came there, save only Caleb and Joshua, who followed the Lord fully and sincerely, Numb. xiv. 34, xxxii. 8—13. It is sad when a man shall come near the kingdom of heaven, and yet never come there, Mark xii. 34: to sink within sight of the harbour; like Rachel, to die within a mile of Ephrath, Gen. xxxv. 16; to come within one stride of the mark, and yet miss it, that torments the soul. Many purpose well, and promise well, they begin to repent, and begin to reform, but they are ever beginning, and never bring any thing to perfection: like those "silly women" who were "ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth," 2 Tim. iii. 7; like that hypocritical son, who said he would go, but "went not," Matt. xxi. 30, their cold and heartless essays come to nothing. These lose heaven many times for some one lust, as Judas for his covetousness, Esau for a mess of pottage, and the young man who had done much, yet in whom one thing was lacking, which marred all, Mark x. 21; if he could but have parted with that, he might have had Christ and happiness.

O then deny yourselves universally, sell all for the pearl of price; you may buy gold too dear, but you can never buy Christ too dear. What if thou part with riches, pleasures, friends? thou shalt have better riches, pleasures, and friends, all shall be made up in a better kind; yea, thy friends and riches (if God see it good for thee) shall be given thee into the bargain, Matt. vi. 33.

It is true, conviction is very necessary, and an excellent preparative to conversion; as ploughing fits the ground for sowing, so does this fit the heart for grace: and therefore the first work of the Spirit is, to "reprove the world of sin," John xvi. 8. A man must by the law be convinced of his misery, before ever he will beg for mercy; and though all are not converted who are convinced, yet all are convinced who are converted. Men will not come to Christ till they see no other remedy. The malefactor cries not for a psalm of mercy, till he be cast. The prodigal never cares for coming to his father, till he comes to see and say, Here "I perish with hunger," Luke xv. 17. Men must be beaten out of their strong holds, like fish out of their holes, or else they will not come in; we may break hook and line too, to get out a great fish, but cannot, till he be half choked. First convince a man that his disease is desperate, and then persuade him to cut off a leg or an arm. First disarm men of all shifts and flattering dreams, and then you will bring them to their knees. Saul had many shifts, but Samuel refts them all, and at last brings him to, "I have sinned," 1 Sam. xv. 30. If you belong to God, he will effectually convince you in his due time; he that has begun a good work in you, will finish it; he that has brought to the birth, will give strength to bring forth; he that has brought you out of Sodom, will not rest till he has set you safe in Zoar; he perfects all his works in his people, Psal. lvii. 2.

This then is the first and great work of the Spirit, to convince men thoroughly of their lost and undone condition. This is virtually and fundamentally all; till this be done, no good can be done; we shall never be truly humbled, nor prize a Saviour, nor be fit for his service, nor be intrusted by him. Men must be convinced in themselves what they are in themselves, before Christ will reveal himself unto them. Christ will not pour the oil of mercy, but into broken hearts; nor be a physician to any, till they be sick of sin. Such will be ductible and tractable to his will. Paul, when unhorsed and humbled to the ground, is ready to do whatever Christ commands him, Acts ix. 6.

Naturally men have covers, false colours, cavils and excuses for sin; but when the Spirit comes with convincing power, it stops their mouths, and puts them to silence, so that they have nothing to say for themselves, Rom. iii. 19; they see themselves to be guilty, and such as cannot plead their own cause without an advocate. Whilst men are in their natural condition, they are full of self-righteousness, and filled with false notions. Like spiders, we are full of poison, and yet not sick of it, because it is our nature; but when the Spirit comes, it undeceives men, it rectifies their judgments, and confutes those vain conceits which before possessed them. It now clearly convinces them of the vanity of the creature, of the hatefulness of sin, and the necessity of a Saviour. Conviction is a clear and infallible demonstration, which takes away all a man's shifts, and does so nonplus him, that he has nothing to say for himself. When Christ had confuted the Pharisees, he took their cloaks from them: Now I have spoken to them, "they have no cloak for their sin," John xv. 22. Every natural man has some cloak and cover for his sin; but when the Spirit comes, carnal arguments are confuted, and the devil's strong holds are battered, 2 Cor. x. 4, 5; now he confesses he is poor and naked, lost and undone, without a Saviour; now he has no plea, nothing to pretend by way of excuse for himself. And this is the first form in Christ's school; he will never prove a good proficient in the higher form of the gospel, that has not first been convinced and abased by the terrors of the law. God will have men know what he has done for them, and his grace prized at a due rate, and respected by them. Christ is not Christ to any till sin be seen; neither can we bring you to any thing in Christ, till we have brought you to nothing in yourselves. When men are first broken up with the sight and sense of sin, then they may expect to be sown in righteousness, Hos. x. 12. Take heed then,

[1.] Of resisting the Spirit's convictions; do not drive, drink, or game them away; it is a sin against the Holy Ghost so to do, though not the sin against the Holy Ghost, Acts vii. 51. Many stifle the Spirit's convictions, like harlots, who destroy their conceptions that they may avoid the pangs of child-birth. Put not out God's light in thy soul, lest his Spirit strive no more with you in this kind, Gen. vi. 3. When God sends his ministers to preach, print, dispute, and convince you, yet if you will not be convinced, take heed lest he say, you shall not be convinced; and in his wrath he say, Means of grace never better this people, sacraments never comfort them, sermons never stir them; since they will be filthy, let them be for ever filthy, and since they will not be purged, they shall not be purged till they die. Thus for God not to strive is the sorest judgment, and a forerunner of some dreadful judgment upon a person or nation.

Many love to hear of privileges, but not of duties; of salvation, but not of sanctification; of heaven, but not of conviction and conversion, which is the way thither. Like the Israelites, that liked Canaan, but would not go through a wilderness to it. But a gracious soul is thankful for humiliation, as well as for consolation; and blesses God, when by his word and Spirit he convinces him of his misery, that so he may be fit for mercy. The sinner convinced of sin, is nearer heaven than the best natural man in the world. Publicans and harlots, that have no excuse nor apology for their gross sins, are in a more hopeful way of cure, than Pharisees, who think themselves righteous enough. Better (saith Austin) be a humble sinner than a proud innocent.

[2.] Of ignorance and unbelief, which are two great hinderances of conviction. When men know not their misery, nor believe the curses which yet are due to them, no wonder if such be unwrought upon.

[3.] Of quenching the motions of the Spirit in you, for if ever you be convinced, the Spirit must do it, John xvi. 8; all the men and ministers in the world cannot do it without the Spirit. We may tell you long enough of this and that sin which you have done, and all to no purpose, till the Spirit sets in with the work, and makes you sensible of sin; then, and never till then, it becomes effectual. Mark, therefore, when the Spirit moves in thee, and improve those opportunities for thy soul's advantage. For as, when children are come to the natural birth, it is God that must and can give strength to bring forth; so, much more in this supernatural birth, is his almighty assistance requisite.

O, then, follow on convictions till they come to conversion, be no longer unwise children, that "stay long" in the place of bringing forth. Be not almost, but altogether, Christians. Rest not content with a name of living, but live indeed. Beseech the Lord to bring thy soul out of this prison, tell him that Christ has proclaimed liberty to captives, and thou art one; thou hast been long in captivity to sin and Satan, beseech him now at last to free thee, and thy soul shall praise him. Be earnest, let God see that thy desires are real, and then he that has brought to the birth will give strength to bring forth.

[4.] Consider, if a man may attain conviction, and yet miss of conversion and salvation, what will become of those that were never yet convinced of their sin, nor had so much as the faith of devils, to believe and tremble. If Jehu that was zealous for God, and Ahab that humbled himself, and Judas that lived unblamably, and the Pharisees that prayed and fasted, and Herod that reformed many things, and Ananias and Sapphira that gave their goods to pious uses; if all these came short of heaven, where, oh where, will thousands amongst us appear, that come short of those who came short of heaven? Rest not then in thy dead and formal condition, but get a sound and thorough conversion. To quicken you, consider,

(1.) In so doing you will be wise children. Naturally we all desire to be accounted wise, the title of fool is odious to us; but we are never wise indeed, till convictions go on to thorough conversion. When the prodigal was enabled to determine to return, then, and not till then, did he come to himself, Luke xv. 17.

(2.) You shall have God's Spirit to assist you. The work indeed is hard, but such assistance will make it easy. The Spirit of God loves to be employed in such noble work as the destruction of sin, and the exalting of Christ in the soul. He is the Spirit of comfort and peace, but he lays the foundation of it in convincing us of our sin and misery.

(3.) It will make you profit more by sermons, sacraments, prayer, &c. When the soul is thus ploughed up with a sense of sin, then it is a fit soil to sow the seed of God's word in.

(4.) It will prevent abundance of sorrow. If Ephraim had not stayed so long in the place of bringing forth, it had been better with him, and he had prevented those desolations that after seized upon him.

(5.) By coming off fully to Christ, you will enjoy abundance of peace and comfort, which otherwise you will miss of. A thorough conversion brings joy, as a woman that is once delivered of her birth, forgets her sorrow for joy that a child is born into the world. The wise merchant, who sold all, and parted with every lust, for Christ, went away rejoicing, as having made a wise bargain. The Spirit lays the foundation of comfort, first in convincing men of their sin and misery, and then of an all-sufficient righteousness to free them from that misery, John xvi. 9, 10.

Obs. 4. Impenitent sinners are unwise men. Impenitent Ephraim is called "an unwise son;" though for number, power, and riches, he was the chief of the tribes. Hence impenitent sinners, and fools, are synonymous in Scripture, Prov. i. 7, 32; Psal. xiv. 1; Rom. i. 22; Tit. iii. 3. Though the blind world may admire, yet, in God's esteem, for all their parts and power, they are but fools and mad-men, 1 Sam. xxv. 25; Luke xii. 20; xv. 17; 1 Cor. ii. 14. It is a grief to parents when their children are fools, Prov. x. 1; xix. 13; and it is a trouble to God when his children are stubborn fools, that may, but will not, know the things that concern their peace. When men are wise to do evil, but averse to do good, when men forget the God of their mercies, and suffer seducers to mislead them, this speaks men fools, Deut. xxxii. 6; Gal. iii. 1. When men fear sufferings more than sin, and resist assistance when it is tendered them, and had rather be strangled in the birth than have strength to bring forth, all this proclaims men's folly.

Obs. 5. To be stupid under judgments is a sore judgment. To be sick, and yet to be insensible of sickness, is a deadly sign: yet so was Ephraim here; the pangs of a travailing woman were upon him, yet he "stays long" in the place of bringing forth, like a child that does not struggle or move for its own relief, which is mortal both to the mother and the child. It is made a note of a wicked man, that he cries not to God for help and deliverance, when he binds him with the cords of correction, Job xxxv. 13. Men are stupid indeed, when they are wasted, and yet will not be warned; plagued, and yet not instructed, Isa. i. 5; ix. 13; Jer. v. 3; Amos iv. 6, 11. Yet such there have been, and are still, that are no whit affected with God's judgments upon them, nor repent they of their sins, though scorched with plagues, Isa. xlii. 25; Rev. ix. 20; xvi. 9, 11. And is not this England's sin? The pangs of a travelling woman are come upon us, and we are encompassed with dangers on every side; grey hairs, which are a sign of weakness, old age, and death approaching, are here and there upon us; yet we know it not, so as to make a right use of it, and to repent, Hos. vii. 9. The more pains God takes to cure us, the more we revolt both in doctrine and manners; and, therefore, since in our filthiness there is lewdness, and we will not be purged, we may justly fear that we shall not be purged, but as we have had our will, so God will have his will too: I will cause my fury to rest upon you, Ezek. xxv. 13.

It will be our wisdom to foresee the plague, and hide ourselves; to mourn for the things we cannot mend; to keep ourselves free from the sins of the time, that so we may be kept free from those plagues which are certainly coming upon this sinful land: if any thing set us free from the sense of evil, it is the fear of evil, Prov. xxvii. 14; Hab. iii. 16.

Obs. 6. God owns his people even when they are guilty of great folly and stupidity. Ephraim is a son, though "an unwise son." The ten tribes under Jeroboam, Ahab, and the rest of those wicked kings of Israel, were sadly overgrown with idolatry, security, impentency, &c.; and yet God owns them for his people to the last, and their circumcision as valid still. Jerusalem that killed the prophets, yet was owned by Christ for the church of God; and he preached unto them, even when he wept over them for their sins, and for the foreseen calamities which were coming on them. The church of Corinth, what carnality, divisions, and profanation of holy things were amongst them, and yet still styled "the church of God," 1 Cor. i. 2. Great, then, is the uncharitableness of those people, that cast off churches and people whom God has not cast off, and unchurch those whom God has not unchurched. The brother of the prodigal was angry at his father's kind reception of him, and calls him "this thy son," by way of proud disdain, and not this my brother, Luke xv. 28—30.

How many are angry at us for owning the Church of England for a national church, and her parochial assemblies for true assemblies, though the word and sacraments be rightly dispensed there! This savours strongly of Pharisaical pride, and too high conceits that some have of themselves and of their church way, in whose assemblies there may be found worse things than in many of those churches which yet they reject.

Ver. 14. I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction: repentance shall be hid from mine eyes.

This verse is a kind of parenthesis, and being taken entirely in itself, the context will run more smoothly. It is full of knots and difficulties, having almost as many interpretations as interpreters, and as many various lectures as words.

"I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death." Some read these words conditionally, and put in the word if, taking the verb in a different mood and tense, thus, if Ephraim were wise and would but repent, I would have ransomed him from death, I would have redeemed him from the power of the grave; that is, I would either have preserved him from captivity, or else I would have delivered him thence. This is true, but not from the text, for the word is אָרַם I will ransom, I will redeem; and we may not change mood and tense to make a sense of our own, though never so good. The words therefore are to be taken simply in themselves, for a singular support to God's people in their deepest distresses; as containing in them a precious cordial, and a most comfortable evangelical promise, of a mighty redemption and glorious resurrection to the remnant according to the election of grace, whom God would have comforted in times of distress. It is usual with the prophets to intermingle comforts with their threatenings, to keep God's people from despair. So Hos. i., ii., xi.; Amos ix. 8—15. Before he had threatened destruction to the wicked, now he comforts the penitent. In the words we have,

1. The deep distress that God's people were in, they were in the hand of the grave, and in the jaws of death, i. e. they were as it were dead and buried in captivity. The word אָרַם signifies both the grave and hell.

(1.) It is for the grave, Gen. xxxvii. 35; Prov. xxx. 16. (2.) For hell metaphorical, i. e. some deep distress, Psal. lxxxvi. 13. (3.) For the local hell, Prov. xv. 11. We may take in all these significations, for Christ has redeemed us from them all, and triumphed over them on the cross, Col. ii. 14.

2. A promise of their redemption from this their misery. "I will ransom them from the power of the grave." What is that? Why exegetically it is added, "I will redeem them from death;" that is, I will bring my elect out of their captivity, where they lay for dead, and this deliverance shall be to them a pledge of their resurrection to eternal life.

3. The manner how this shall be done, set forth by a prosopopoeical apostrophe to death and the grave, whom he brings in as some living enemy, and therefore calls to him, saying, "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." O death, thou seemest to be mighty and powerful, but I will wholly disarm thee; I will not only bite thee, but utterly destroy thee.

4. The certainty of this deliverance, drawn from the constancy of God in keeping his promise, and from the immutability of his decree. "Repentance shall be hid from mine eyes;" נִסְתָּר מֵעֵינַי I will never repent of the mercy which I have promised them, but my goodness to them shall be firm and unalterable. This sense suits best with the original and with the context, wherein God promises a choice mercy to his people. The Vulgate and Seventy render it, consolation is hid from mine eyes: true, נִסְתָּר signifies consolation as well as repentance; but to render it as a threatening here, as if God should say, I am fully determined to destroy my people, for consolation is hid from mine eyes, is very improper, for it confounds the context, and the scope of the verse, which is to comfort, and not to disquiet God's people. In it the prophet, the better to strengthen their faith, highly extols God's almighty power; for in straits we are very apt to question that, Numb. xi. 13—23; Psal. lxxviii. 19. To an eye of sense, God's people, lying in captivity, were as dead men, and past all hope of recovery: Yes, saith the prophet, though ye were dead, yet God can raise you again, for he is Lord of death and hell, and has a sovereign power over them all; though death conquers all, yet he conquers death; though it be mighty, yet God is almighty, and there is nothing too hard for him; he will be the death of death, and if none will redeem you thence, he will.

The question is, of what redemption and deliverance does the prophet here speak, whether of a temporal or spiritual redemption? I answer, of both.

1. Literally the Lord promises to free his elect and penitent people from the grave of their captivity. Banished men are counted as dead men, especially in a civil sense, and the place of their banishment is as the grave. Now many of the remnant of Israel, after the destruction of their kingdom, joined themselves to the Jews, and with them came out of Babylon. Though, for their idolatry and ingratitude, he threatened perpetual banishment to them, yet, for the comfort of his people then, and of their progeny, he promises a redemption for them, Hos. i. 10; which was fulfilled about two hundred years after that Samaria was taken, when Cyrus proclaimed liberty to the Jews to go build the temple, Ezra i.

2. Typically it alludes to our spiritual and eternal redemption by Christ, and our conquest over death and hell by him. By Adam's sin, death came upon all men, Rom. v. 15; but Christ, by his resurrection, has freed us from the power of death, and has led it captive, which formerly led us captive, Psal. lxxviii. 18; Eph. iv. 8. This is the redemption (saith Zanchy) which is principally and properly here meant: for though the people of Judah, after seventy years' captivity in Babylon, did return again out of it; yet the people of Israel, after that Samaria was taken, never returned again to their own land, for it was laid waste, and inhabited by strangers. It is usual with the prophets, suddenly to digress from their history to Christ, who was their scope, delight, and love; so that every hint and shadow in the Old Testament brought him to their remembrance: and then from Christ to recur to their history again. Thus it is here; and so Isaiah, prophesying of Cyrus, who should deliver Israel out of Babylon, in the same chapter prophesies of Christ the redeemer of his church, Isa. xlv.; and Ezekiel, having inveighed against idle and idol shepherds, presently turns his speech to Christ, who is the true Shepherd of his people, Ezek. xxxiv. 2—16: so Zech. ix. 9; xiii. 6, 7.

In this verse the prophet introduces death and the grave, as two tyrannical enemies, to whom he speaks in the name of the Lord Christ (as the apostle expounds it, 1 Cor. xv. 55) as a conqueror, saying, "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." Or as the apostle from the Septuagint, (though in this text the apostle in some things varies from the present Septuagint, and so do other citations in the New Testament; which shows the folly of those, who equalize it with the original Hebrew,) "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" 1 Cor. xv. 55. The first Adam brought death into the world, but the Second Adam has abolished it.

There is some difficulty in the words, and therefore I shall open them particularly, and break every clod, that I may find out the golden ore in this glorious triumph over death, and notable encomium on the resurrection of the dead.

Piscator and others read the words interrogatively, as an insulting and triumphing interrogation, thus, O death, where are thy plagues? O grave, where is thy destruction? They are no where to be found, for Christ has removed them, and taken them out of the way of his people, so that now there is no hurt in death. This various reading comes from the ambiguous signification of the word מתי which is rendered by some, I will be;

Paulus versionem Septuagintae imitari videtur, quis ex verbo ostendit, in quo erat Corinthiis. Sed Interim non discedit ab Hebraeo & Vulgatae. Fet. Martij.

by the Septuagint, σου, where; and the apostle, following the Septuagint, speaking to Greeks, and that in Greece, alleges a Greek text, as being most familiar and best known to them. The apostle gives the sense and meaning, but not the words, which is frequent in Scripture; the penmen being intent on the matter, were not curious in the words, but did add and alter what might explain and clear them; yet the prophet and the apostle are easily reconciled, thus, "O death, I will be thy plagues," i. e. I will pull out thy pestilent sting; "O grave, I will be thy destruction," i. e. I will get the victory over thee. I, the Lord Christ, will redeem them from death by paying a valuable price for their redemption; this none could do but I: yea, I will be the death of death, I will be its plagues and destruction; it shall never prevail against my people, for I will restore them to life again, 1 Cor. xv. 26, 54, 55. It is not I am, or I have been, but, I will be, thy destruction. Now, in Hebrew, the future tense oft expresses both the present and preterperfect tenses; it implies not only the time to come, but also the time present, and the time past; I am, I have been, and shall be for ever, death's destroyer. Christ was virtually the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world, and so was death's destroyer; but actually he conquered death and the grave, by lying dead in the grave, and by his almighty power raising himself thence again, so that death hath now no more dominion over him and his, Acts ii. 24.

"O death, I will be thy plagues;" מתי אהי תהי לאיך not one or two, but many plagues, even so many as shall destroy thee. Thou didst destroy my people, but now I will destroy thee; thou didst triumph over them, but now I will triumph over thee, and lead thee, and all the enemies of my people, in triumph at my chariot wheels, Psal. lxxviii. 18; Eph. iv. 8; for under death and the grave is synecdochically comprehended the conquest of all the enemies of our salvation; as sin, death, hell, Satan, banishment, imprisonment, poverty, sickness, tribulation, persecution, famine, sword, &c., over all these we are more than conquerors, even triumphers, through Christ that loved us, Rom. viii. 35, 37. He names only death, because death is "the last enemy that shall be destroyed," 1 Cor. xv. 26; yet, by an argument from the greater to the less, he comforts his people thus, If I can deliver you from death and the grave, then much more from banishment and captivity.

"O grave, I will be thy destruction," מתי אהי תהי לאיך I will be thy rooting out and cutting off. The same word is used, Deut. xxxii. 24; Psal. xci. 6; Isa. xxxviii. 2; and here implies, Thou didst destroy my people, but now I will destroy thee, so that they may now sing triumphantly, O death, where is thy pestilent sting, wherewith thou wast wont to torture and torment us? it is gone, it is destroyed by Christ, who is thy death, O death, and thy utter destruction. As a man that drinks a cup of poison, drinks that which will be his ruin; so the grave, by swallowing and devouring Christ, was conquered and killed by him. Of old they did celebrate the victories and triumphs of Achilles, Hercules, Alexander, Julius Caesar, and the rest of the great conquerors of the world; but, alas, all those died and were conquered by death. Only Christ, the King and Saviour of his church and people, by his death has conquered sin, Satan, and death; and has made full satisfaction for us to the law and justice of God.

So that which the prophet speaks here of the restoration of the Jews in particular, the apostle applies to the general resurrection of the dead: "When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55; where the apostle quotes two texts, and it is usual with the penmen of the New Testament to refer to divers texts out of the Old Testament, and to unite them into one in the New. So Peter, speaking against Judas, מתי significant non simpliciter habere, sed pretio redemptionis redimere. Ita מתי significant jure afflictio redimere, unde מתי affinis, ad quem pertinebat redemptio possessionum. Zanchij.

Acts i. 20, saith, "It is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein: and his bishoprick let another take:" the former part is taken out of Psal. lxxix. 25, and the latter part out of Psal. cix. 8. So of Mark i. 2, 3, the former part is taken out of Mal. iii. 1, the latter from Isa. xl. 3. So Christ himself, Matt. xxi. 13, alludes to Isa. lvi. 7, and Jer. vii. 11. So here the apostle cites one text out of Isa. xxv. 8, "He will swallow up death in victory," כי יבלע המות לנצח which the Seventy render, καρίστην ὁ θάνατος ἡτρώσας, death devours all; but this is contrary both to the sense of the prophet and the apostle, who speak not of the prevailing power of death, but of the power of Christ over death. Death is swallowed up in victory, and that great devourer of all is by Christ devoured. This promise is now fulfilled in the death of Christ, who has already destroyed the power of death for his people; and shall be completely fulfilled at the resurrection of the dead, when all corruption and mortality shall be totally taken away, and death shall be swallowed up in victory for ever. In the sense of this mercy, the apostle breaks forth, ravished as it were with the contemplation of this conquest over death, into a triumphant song, which all the saints shall sing at the last day: when they shall be totally freed from the captivity of death and the grave, then shall they insult over subdued death, and say, "O death, where is thy sting," wherewith thou wast wont to wound all creatures? "O grave, where is thy victory," by which thou hast hitherto kept the dead under by force, which now thou must render again, as not being able any longer to hold them under thy power? Rev. xx. 13, 14. It is only sin by which death has power over us; and it is the just rigour of the law which inflicts death upon us for sin. But thanks be to God who has given us the victory over sin, which is the cause of death, and over death, which is inflicted for sin, through Jesus Christ our Lord, by whom we obtain an immortal and incorruptible life. Thus the apostle has faithfully given us the sense of the prophet, though not his very words.

The sum and substance of all is this, Though Ephraim has been an unwise son, and has delayed his returning unto me, yet his impenitency and security shall not retard or disannul my faithfulness and truth to my people, I will never repent of those gracious promises which I have made to them, but will certainly fulfil them. Let not therefore my chosen, penitent ones despair as if there were no hope, no help for them; for I, their Saviour, will redeem them from the power of all their enemies, and cause them to rise from death (which had power over them through sin) to the glory of eternal life. So that now they may begin their triumphant song, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Obs. 1. Though the Lord be terrible to the wicked, yet he is a tower to the righteous. Though plagues come suddenly and inevitably upon the wicked, like pangs upon a woman in travail, yet even then has the Lord a tender respect to his people, and will ransom them from the power of the grave, Isa. i. 24—27; iii. 10, 11. And though they should go into captivity with the wicked, yet God will set a distinguishing mark of mercy upon them, Ezek. ix. 4; Rev. vii. 3. In the midst of his judgments he remembers mercy, and has a tender care over his people, making them to be pitied of all that lead them captive, Psal. cvi. 46; wherever they go, they have his more especial presence with them to uphold and comfort them, Isa. xliii. 2, 3; Jer. xvi. 13—15; Micah iv. 10; Dan. iii.; vi. 22. When all forsake them, yet I will not forsake them, but will be "a little sanctuary" to them in their captivity, Ezek. xi. 16, 17. God is ever mindful of his covenant to his people, and in the midst of all confusions, he has an ark for Noah, a Zoar for Lot, a Midian for Moses, a Haran for Jacob, a cave for David, a grave for Methuselah, and Josiah, and a Pella for Christians. Elijah, that was zealous, and a man of fire for God in wicked times, was carried in a fiery chariot to heaven. Jeremiah, that witnessed against the corruptions of the times, how tenderly does the king of Babylon deal with him, when the king and his nobles lay in misery! Jer. xxxix. 11—14.

Obs. 2. The Scripture of the Old Testament is the word of God. The apostle shows us the divine authority of it, even in gospel times, by referring to this text, and another in Isa. xxv. 8, to prove the Divine mystery of the resurrection. About four hundred places are cited out of the Old Testament in the New. Both Testaments are the sacred word of the great God, and serve for mutual illustration and explanation.

Obs. 3. The Scripture lies not in the bare words and syllables, but in the sense and meaning. Hence it is that Christ and his apostles, citing texts out of the Old Testament, give us the sense and meaning of the place, but not the very words; so in a text sometimes they omit a word, and sometimes they add something for explanation's sake, as Matt. ii. 15, 23; xxvi. 31; Rom. x. 15—21. So Gen. ii. 24, compared with Matt. xix.

5, where of önu, they two, is added emphatically, not they twenty, shall be one flesh. So Deut. vi. 13, compared with Matt. iv. 10, where the exclusive particle, μόνον, only, which was not expressed in Deuteronomy, but tacitly and interpretatively understood, is added by our Saviour very significantly. So Isa. lxiv. 4, collated with 1 Cor. ii. 9, "Neither have entered into the heart of man:" these words are added by way of illustration by the apostle. So Isa. xxiii. 13, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die." But the apostle puts it in the present tense, 1 Cor. xv. 32, "to-morrow we die;" and this he does for explication's sake, to express the desperate madness of those epicures, who would eat and drink securely, although they were to die presently. This shows the folly of the quaking Scripturists, (such there are in our days as well as anti-scripturists,) who take the bare words and syllables, and will not suffer any meaning or exposition to be given of them. Thus when they call for a proof of infant baptism, you must show them in so many words, Thou shalt baptize infants, else they will not believe you. Tell them, that generals include particulars, and that children are confederates, and in covenant with their parents, and therefore have right to the seal of the covenant; and that infant baptism now is as lawful as infant circumcision of old; yet this doth not satisfy, because they cannot read in so many letters, Thou shalt baptize infants. So the papists stick to the bare letter, "This is my body." Whereas that bread could not be his natural body, for Christ was then alive when he said, "This is my body;" and the apostle calls it bread four or five times after consecration, 1 Cor. xi. 23—28.

The Scripture lies not in the bare and naked words, but in the scope and true interpretation of the words, which is, as it were, the soul and life of the Scripture. Hence Christ bids us not barely read, but search for the sense and meaning of the Scriptures, John v. 39. The lawyers have a saying, mens legis est lex, not the bare words, but the meaning of the law is the law.

Obs. 3. Christ is the Lord. He who has power over death and hell is the Lord; but Christ has this power, Rev. i. 18; xx. 13, death and hell gave up their dead to Christ their Judge. It is he that by the price of his own blood has redeemed us from the hand of sin and Satan, from death and hell; what the prophet spake of Jehovah, the apostle applies to Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 54, 55.

Perspicuum est apostolos et evangelistas in Veterum Scripturarum interpretatione, sensum quæsum non verba, nec inagnopere de ordine sermonibus quæsum curasse, dum intellecta res paueret. Jerom. ad Pammach.

Ne paterem in verbis Scripturarum esse evangelium, sed in sensu, non in superficie, sed in medulla, non in sermone foliis, sed in radice rationis. Jerom. Com. ad Gal. l.

Obs. 4. There is a holy harmony and sweet consent in the Scripture. There is no repugnancy, no real contradiction there; like stones in an arch, they mutually uphold and strengthen each other. The doctrine of the prophets gives light to the apostles, and the apostles again illustrate and explain the prophets. In both there is one and the same Spirit of truth, who "at sundry times, and in divers manners," has published one and the same truth to his people, Heb. i. 1, 2. They must not therefore be opposed, but composed; not made to contradict, but to confirm each other, Luke xxiv. 44.

Obs. 5. God's people, whilst in this world, may fall into deep distress and misery. They may be brought so low, that to a carnal eye they may seem dead and buried, past hope and help, not only in their own eyes, but also in the eyes of others. We have a notable instance for this, in Ezek. xxxvii. 1—15; the desperate condition of God's people in their Babylonish captivity, is there set forth by dead, dried bones, to an eye of sense past all hope or possibility of recovery; inasmuch that God's own people, whose faith should not fail, cry out, ver. 11, "Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost: we are cut off for our parts." Yea, the prophet himself was staggered: the Lord asked him, ver. 3, "Son of man, can these bones live?" is it possible that ever such dry bones should live again? The prophet answers, "O Lord God, thou knowest:" it passes my apprehension to conceive how this should be, I know not how it should be effected; but, Lord, thou knowest what thou hast to do, and to thee nothing is impossible. This the Lord does in his wisdom, to draw us out of ourselves and all creature confidences, that in a holy desperation we may say with repenting Israel, "Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy," Hos. xiv. 3.

Obs. 6. God in his due time will deliver his people out of the deepest distress. He is omnipotent, he can and will redeem Israel, not out of one or two, but "out of all his troubles," Psal. xxv. 22. Art thou weak? He can strengthen thee. Art thou sick? He can heal thee. Art thou dark? He can enlighten thee. Art thou dead? He can enliven thee. Hast thou lain in thy grave till thou stinkest again? So did Lazarus. Hast thou lain till thou art rotten? So did Israel in their Babylonish captivity, and yet were restored, Ezek. xxxvii. 11, 12. So in deserts we are apt to despond; when we walk in darkness, and can see no light, neither sun-light nor moon-light, neither star-light nor candle-light, but are like unto dry bones in a sepulchre, without life, without spirit, without strength, without comfort, and see no way of deliverance. Aye, but now is a time to live by faith, and not by sense, Isa. xl. 27—31; l. 10. Such is our weakness, that we art apt to "limit the Holy One of Israel," and to think that he can help us in lesser trials, and bring us out of petty crosses; but when some great waves of temptation come, then we are apt to question God's power and promises, and to say with David, "I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul," 1 Sam. xxvii. 1. We are apt to say with Martha, if Christ had come a little sooner, he might have raised Lazarus, but "by this time he stinketh," and is past help, John xi. 39. Aye, but it is the better for that, for now Christ's power will be the more manifested, and his Father the more glorified. The more grievous thy disease, the greater will the praise of thy Physician be in thy cure; and we shall love much, when we see how much is forgiven; and therefore David makes it an argument to move the Lord to pity him, because his sins were great, Psal. xxv. 11.

Remember, it is God's usual course to let men be dead and buried (as it were) in misery, and to bring things to extremity, and then appear, Gen. xxii. 14; Psal. xvi. 1; when trouble comes, then he comes too. We read of three persons that Christ raised from the dead: one was dead, but not carried out, Mark v. 41. A second was dead, and carried out, Luke vii. 14. A third was dead, carried out, buried, and lay till he stunk in his grave, and that was Lazarus; Christ speaks but the word, "Lazarus, come forth," and he lives. God is never nearer to his people than when to a carnal eye he seems farthest off; as we see in the three young men that were cast into a fiery furnace, and Daniel into the lions' den. Sense and carnal reason would have said, God had now forsaken them, and there was no help, yet even then did they find the greatest help; so good it is to trust in God.

Obs. 7. Death in itself is a formidable enemy, and, considered as a curse due to impenitent sinners, is very terrible; even the most terrible of all terribles, as Aristotle calls it. It is armed with stings and plagues, and is therefore called an "enemy," 1 Cor. xv. 26; and "the king of terrors," even such a terror as is the chiefest and greatest of terrors, Job xviii. 14. Hence dreadful calamities are set forth by "the shadow of death," Job x. 21, 22; xvi. 16; xxiv. 17; Psal. xxiii. 4; Jer. xiii. 16; the "messengers of death," Prov. xvi. 14; and the "snares, sorrows, and terrors of death," Psal. xviii. 4, 5; lv. 4. It is this that snatches men, when they least think of it, from their dear relations, pleasures, riches, recreations, mansions, honours, which they love as their lives; and this must needs be terrible to a natural man, who has no assurance of better things when he dies. Hence such are said to be in bondage, and a slavish fear of death, all their life long, Heb. ii. 15. Whilst wicked men look upon death at a distance, and think it far off, they fear it not; but when God shall open their eyes by sickness, and summon them to appear before him, then, like Pashur, they are Magor-missabib, a terror to themselves, and all that are round about them, Jer. xx. 3, 4. Saul, though a king, and a valiant man, yet, when he heard that death was at the door, and he must die to-morrow, was so dispirited with this dismal news, that he fell into a deadly trance, and was not able to bear it; the fear of death had well nigh ended him before his death came, 1 Sam. xxviii. 19, 20. So Belshazzar, a mighty monarch, in the height of his mirth, is "greatly troubled," his countenance is changed, his thoughts trouble him, and his joints are loosed; but whence came all this terror and amazement? from fear of this king of fears, death, which suddenly after surprised him, Dan. v. This puts an end to all a wicked man's comforts and hopes; conscience shall now be awakened, and he must give an account of his stewardship. This made Louis XI., king of France, to command his servants, in his sickness, that they should not once mention that bitter word death in his hearing. Yea, even the godly, in a temptation, for fear of death, have not acted like themselves at other times; as we see in three of the greatest worthies that we read of in the Scriptures: first, Abraham, famous for faith, Gen. xii. 12, 13; xx. 2, 11; and David, famous for valour, 1 Sam. xxi. 12, 13; and Peter, for courage, yet to save his life Peter denied his Lord.

Obs. 8. Death is a conquered enemy. Christ has disarmed him, and taken away his sting. He has redeemed his from the power of the grave, and swallowed up death in victory. Christ, by his death, has destroyed death, and "him that had the power of death, the devil," Heb. ii. 14. By suffering of that death which was due to us for our sins, he has destroyed the power of

*Ἡ θάνατος πέντην τῶν φοβερῶν
φοβερῶτων.
Arist. Ethic. l. 3. c. 6.*

*See Caryl on Job
xviii. 14.*

Diabolus dicitur habere mortis imperium, non quia res, sed quia tyrannus, vel quia carnis qui habet imperium in eos qui morti propter facinora sua adju-cati et ignis ultreriti traditi sunt.

Gerhard.

death, destroyed his kingdom, and became more glorious by dying; like another Samson, he slew more at his death than in his life. So that now we are more than conquerors, ὑπερνικῶμεν, we are even triumphers through "him that loved us." He has triumphed over death, and all the enemies of our salvation, and we in him, our Head, triumph, 2 Cor. ii. 14; Col. ii. 14, 15.

By lying in the grave he has sweetened our grave for us, so that now we may sleep in it as in a bed of down, Isa. lvii. 2; and our flesh may "rest in hope" of a glorious resurrection, Psal. xvi. 9. Now, if ever, we may sing that triumphant song, "O death, where is thy sting?" It is destroyed, abolished, gone. This strong man armed is overcome by a stronger than he. Neither the pleasures of life, nor the pains of death; neither the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity, nothing now can separate us from Christ, Job v. 20—22; Rom. viii. 35—39. Death may dissolve our corporal marriage, but it is so far from abolishing, that it perfects, our spiritual marriage; killed we may be, but conquered we can never be. Christ's victory is our victory, and all his conquests ours.

But by Christ, by his death, has destroyed death, why then do the godly die? To this I answer, Christ did not die to deliver us from sickness and death, but to free us from the curse that is in these. By his death he has pulled out the sting of death. The death of the body still remains, but the sting, and that which is penal, is taken away, so that it cannot hurt us; and therefore the text saith not, I will free you from death, but ἔ manu mortis, from the destructive power of death; so as it shall have no dominion over you to hurt you, nor be able to separate you from Christ. As the apostle saith of sin, it is in us, but it does not reign in us. So die we must, but death has no dominion over believers, as it has over wicked men; it gets the victory over them, they die, and die eternally; but a believer's death is neither total, penal, nor perpetual.

1. It is not total. It seizes only on the body, the carcass, the outside; it goes to its dust, but the spirit returns to God that gave it, Eccl. xii. 7.

2. It is not penal, but profitable. In the grave we put off our filth, deformities, defects, infirmities, and mortality itself. It is our attiring house, to fit us for immortality and glory.

3. It is not perpetual, it is but a sleeping till the general resurrection, Rom. viii. 10, 11. Our conquest over death is partly fulfilled in this life, but it shall be consummate in facto, and fully completed at the resurrection. Then shall they "awake and sing, that dwell in dust," Isa. xxvi. 19. This upheld Job in the midst of all his sorrows, "I know that my redeemer liveth;" my comfort is, though I die, yet I have one to right me that lives for ever, Job xix. 25. David comforts himself with this, that God would redeem him from the power of the grave, and from the hand of hell; though riches cannot redeem the rich, yet God would redeem him, Psal. xlix. 15.

But I must part with wife, children, friends, pleasures. But know, all these losses will be made up in a better kind; as you may see at large in Mr. Byfield's Cure of the Fear of Death, at the end of his Marrow, p. 745; and Bp. Hall's Balm of Gilead, p. 141.

Let us then not fear death with a slavish fear. Christ died to free us from such a fear of death, Heb. ii. 15. A religious, prudential fear does well; fear it so as to arm yourselves and prepare for it, but not so as to be dejected under it. No wise man will fear a conquered enemy; if you truly believe in Christ, the conqueror of death, you need not fear death. Think on Christ when you think on death, and then you may in a holy sarcasm and contempt say, "O death, where is thy sting?" Christ has unstung it, and, as it were, disarmed it; so that now we may safely put it in our bosoms: buzz it may about our ears as a drone bee, but sting it cannot, for Christ has taken away the guilt of sin, and has made that which was sometimes a curse to become a blessing, of a foe he has made it a friend, of a poison a medicine, of a punishment an advantage, Phil. i. 21, of the gate of hell a passage to heaven. It is now like the valley of Achor, "a door of hope;" that which was sometimes the king of terrors is now become the king of comforts, as making way for the enjoyment of the highest comforts. We part with a life of misery to enjoy a life of glory. We are wont to say, A fair exchange is no robbery; but such a change is our great advantage. Hence it is that the apostle, summing up a Christian's privileges and riches, sets down death as part of it, 1 Cor. iii. 22, not only life, but death is yours. He that can truly say, I am Christ's subject and servant, may as truly say, Death will be my preferment and high advancement. So true it is that of Solomon, Eccl. vii. 1, the day of a man's death is better than the day of his birth. Then, and never till then, shall we rest from our labours, Job iii. 17; Rev. xiv. 13, and be perfectly freed from sin and all its attendant evils.

Look not therefore on death with philosophical eyes, as if it were the end of all our comforts, but look on it with Christian eyes, as the year of jubilee, the day of our coronation, and consummation of the marriage between Christ and our souls.

A natural man, that looks upon death with an eye of sense, sees nothing but horror and terror in it; but a gracious soul, that looks on it with an eye of faith, sees life in death, light in darkness, and comfort in discomfort: though for a time he must lie in the grave, and death seems to have dominion over him, yet he as certainly sees a resurrection as if he were already in possession of it, and therefore he triumphs already in assurance of a total conquest through Christ; death is already swallowed up by him in victory, Isa. xxv. 8. Christ was his life, and therefore now death is his gain.

He lived holily, and now he dies happily; he lived unto the Lord, and therefore he now dies unto him, Rom. xiv. 7, 8; 2 Cor. v. 15. His care was to keep a good conscience, and now he has the comfort of it, 2 Cor. i. 12.

Let atheists, then, and worldlings, and wicked men, fear death, who know no better life; but let the righteous, who has hope in his death, Prov. xiv. 32, embrace it, and bid it welcome, as the martyrs did, who went as joyfully to their stakes as others do to marriages. Witness all those living speeches of dying saints which shall shortly be published by an able and industrious hand to the world. Cyprian, hearing the sentence of death pronounced against him, said, Lord, I thank thee that now thou wilt free me from the bonds of the body. I shall not now lose my life, but change it for a better. Pomponius Algerius, in an epistle which he wrote to his friends from the delectable Hortyard of the Leonine prison, July 12, 1555, excellently saith, I shall tell you strange things, I have found a honeycomb in a lion's belly; in a deep dungeon I have found pleasantness; in a place of bitterness and the shadow of death I have found peace and hope of life. In the belly of hell I have found comfort. Where others weep, there do I sing for joy; and where others fear, there have I support. The good hand of my God has done all this for me. He that seemed sometime to be far from me, is

See Dr. Goodwin on Christ's Death and Resurrection, sect. 2, p. 22. quart.

Tollitur mors non ne sit, sed ne oblit.
Aug.

Non potest male mori qui bene viverit. Aug.

Mr. Trapp.

now most present with me. He that I had but some glimpses of before, I now see face to face. He has turned my winter into a glorious spring; why should I fear any freezing cold, who am thus inflamed with the love of God? Let malefactors fear this prison, to me it flows with honey.

Obs. 9. God's decrees are infallible and unchangeable. Repentance is hid from his eyes, he knows not what it means. "God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent," Numb. xxxiii. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 29. He is Jehovah, he changeth not, Mal. iii. 6. His covenant he will not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of his lips, Psal. lxxxix. 34, 35; ex. 4; Isa. liv. 9, 10; if he has decreed to show mercy to his people and to redeem them from the power of hell, all the devils in hell shall not be able to hinder it. It is not the counsel of men or devils, but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand, Psal. xxxiii. 10, 11. If he has spoken it he will do it, yea, and the contrary plots of wicked men shall help to effect it, Aets ii. 23; Rom. ix. 11.

But is not God said to repent? Gen. vi. 6; Jer. xviii. 8; Amos vii. 3, 6. That is spoken, not properly, but after the manner of men, and according to our capacity, because his work is changed, though himself continueth unchangeable, for with him "is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." He is constant and faithful in performing all his promises to his people, 1 Thess. v. 24. "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies." They are mercy in promising, and truth in performing; not one thing shall fail of all the good things which God has promised to his people, Josh. xxiii. 14; though they be not presently fulfilled, yet in God's due time they shall be accomplished, for though God come not at our time, yet he never fails his own, Deut. xxxii. 35; Hab. ii. 3.

Obs. 10. Believers in this life may be assured of their salvation. Repentance is hid from God's eyes; whom he loves once he loves for ever. Not one of those that the Father has given to Christ shall perish, Matt. xviii. 14; John vi. 39. "The foundation of God standeth sure," more sure than the pillars of the earth or the poles of heaven, 2 Tim. ii. 19. The decree of election is there called, 1. A foundation. 2. A firm and sure foundation. 3. It is not a foundation of man's laying, but it is the foundation of God. 4. It is not a tottering, but a standing foundation, built on a rock, sealed and confirmed by the Spirit, counsel, and special knowledge of God; he "knoweth them that are his." Hence the covenant of the Lord made with his people is called "an everlasting covenant," 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; Hos. ii. 19, 20; and he has promised to plant his fear in their hearts, that they shall never depart from him, Jer. xxxii. 40. If they fall, yet they shall not be utterly cast down, for the Lord upholds them with his hand, Deut. xxxiii. 3; Psal. xxxvii. 24; Prov. ii. 7, 8; John x. 28. They stand not by their own strength, but are kept and guarded by his almighty power "through faith unto salvation," 1 Pet. i. 5. Common gifts and graces may fade and fail, but his gifts, that is, his peculiar, essential gifts, which appertain to salvation, are "without repentance," Rom. xi. 29.

Ver. 15. Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come, the wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up: he shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels.

The prophet having comforted God's people, returns again to the denouncing of judgments against the wicked; and because similitudes make a deep impression, therefore he uses them. He sets forth, ver. 13, their distress by the pains of a woman in travail; and in this 15th verse, the spoil and havoc that should be made amongst them by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, which he illustrates by a double similitude.

But, first, he prevents an objection which Ephraim might make; I am fruitful, and abound with riches, honours, strength, and therefore I fear no fall. Admit it be so, though Ephraim be "fruitful among his brethren," yet "an east wind shall come, the wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up: he shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels."

On this verse there are almost as various interpretations as there be interpreters, so that I may say of it as Maldonate said of another text, Nescio an hic locus facilius fuisset si nemo eum exposuisset, This text had been plainer unexplained.

1. Some make the words a promise of great blessings to Ephraim after all his sorrows; Yet he shall be fruitful amongst his brethren. After the Assyrian had spoiled him of all his treasure, yet by the might of him that ransometh men from the grave, they shall be raised up. But this is a forcing of the words contrary to their genuine sense and meaning.

2. Others apply it to Christ, and say, He shall increase and multiply his elect both in number and glory at the last day. The very rehearsal of this is consolation sufficient.

3. The Vulgate, leaving the Hebrew to follow the Septuagint, read it, Ephraim dividet, Ephraim shall divide amongst his brethren, and make a schism amongst them, therefore God will send the Assyrian against him. But the word is צמח crescet, not dividet.

4. Lyra hic Zarai, when he takes, or rather mistakes, the word for a division and separation at the end of the world, when the evil shall be separated from the good, and the goats from the sheep. Quite contrary to the scope of the text, which speaks of increasing, not of dividing; and of brethren, which sheep and goats were never yet accounted.

In the words then we have,

I. Ephraim's dignity from God's mercy to him.

II. Ephraim's downfall and consequent misery.

I. Ephraim's dignity flowing from God's mercy towards him. "Though he be fruitful among his brethren." He was the head of the tribes, Judah alone excepted, and that only in respect of dignity; for in number of men, and in power and riches, Ephraim excelled them all. The prophet alludes, 1. To Ephraim's name, which signified fruitful and flourishing; such as his name was, such was he; Ephraim was his name, and fruitfulness was with him; both the fruitfulness of the earth, and the fruitfulness of the womb; he was like a bough by a well-side, fruitful, and flourishing, whose branches run over the wall. He had the upper and the nether springs, the blessings of heaven above, and of the earth beneath, Gen. xlix. 22, 25. 2. He alludes to the blessing which Jacob his grandfather gave him on his death-bed; Ephraim "shall be greater than" Manasseh, "and his seed shall become a multitude of nations," Gen. xlviii. 19.

II. Ephraim's downfall and consequent misery. God's mercies should have made him more fruitful and obedient, but he, like an unwise son, became more insolent, idolatrous, and disobedient, Hos. xiii. 5, 6. Therefore God will now sweep all away, and make him know the value of his mercies by the want of them.

"An east wind shall come, the wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up: he shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels."

In which are contained,

Qui ad Christum referit, sicut orationis non advertit Merer.

צמח פירות ארץ, צמח, auctus fert. Gen. xlix. 22.

1. The judgment threatened. "An east wind shall come," קדים רוח "an east wind." This wind usually is most violent and boisterous; when God is said to break ships, it is with "an east wind," Psal. xlvi. 7; when he divided the sea, it was with "a strong east wind," Exod. xiv. 21. It is a dry, sharp, searching, hurtful wind, destructive to the herbs and fruits of the earth, especially in those countries, Gen. xli. 6; Job xv. 2; Ezek. xvii. 10; xix. 12; Isa. xxvii. 8; Jonah iv. 8. Hence, great afflictions are compared to east winds, Job xxvii. 21; Jer. xviii. 17. This east wind is not to be taken properly, but metaphorically; by it is meant the king of Assyria with his forces, who should come from the east, and, like an east wind, should dry up and destroy all before him. In this sense, the violent Chaldeans are compared to an east wind, Hab. i. 9. And the Assyrian is also compared to an eagle, which comes swiftly, with great force and violence.

2. From whom this wind shall come. It comes not by chance or fortune, but it comes from God, and therefore it is called "the wind of the Lord;" that is, a mighty, strong, irresistible wind, carrying down all before it; such a one as God himself shall raise for the punishment of Ephraim, viz. that most cruel and most merciless Assyrian, sent by the Lord to avenge the quarrel of his covenant.

3. From whence it shall come. It "shall come up from the wilderness," where the winds blow most fiercely and vehemently, because they meet with no resistance. It was "a great wind from the wilderness" that brought the house upon Job's children, Job i. 19. This denotes the fierceness of the Assyrian against Israel, he shall rage unmercifully against him.

4. The hurt which this violent wind shall do. "His spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up." What is that? why exagetically there is added, וְהָיָה כַּמַּיִם אֲשֶׁר בְּיַד הַמַּיִם "he shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels." When the fountain is dried, the streams must needs fail. Allusion in this is made to the land of Ephraim, which abounded with fruits and springs, and it withal sets forth the great abundance of all things that Israel enjoyed; they had not drops, or ponds, or torrents, but constant springs of mercy, whilst others had only some streams thereof; they sat at the fountain head, they had the root, when others had but branches, Hos. ix. 16. We might paraphrase the whole thus: Since Ephraim and the rest of the tribes have rebelled against me, they shall be brought to utter desolation; all the springs of my blessings shall be taken from them, and all manner of happiness shall fail them; I will send the Assyrian amongst them, and he shall spoil all their treasures, and carry away all their ornaments; even their most precious and desirable things, though never so closely hid, this searching wind will find them out, be it gold, silver, jewels, costly ointments, perfumes, apparel, or any of the precious fruits of the earth: whatever desirable thing is hid and highly esteemed, either by the covetous, the voluptuous, or the lascivious, shall all become a prey to the merciless Assyrian.

אֲשֶׁר בְּיַד הַמַּיִם which we translate "pleasant vessels," signifies properly a vessel of desire, a Hebraism for very precious things. Hence Daniel is called אִישׁ-הַדְּמָיִם a man of desires; that is, a precious man, and greatly beloved, Dan. x. 11; a good land, אֶרֶץ אֲשֶׁר לַיְדָה a land of desire, that is, a most desirable land, Jer. iii. 19. So all pleasant things, whether gold, jewels, garments, are called things of desires, that is, precious things, 2 Chron. xx. 25; Dan. xi. 8, 38, 43. It is usual with the Hebrews thus to express the superlative degree by putting the substantive in the genitive case.

The sum of all is, Though Ephraim be high, and mightily exalted above his brethren, yet since he has not exalted my name who have exalted him, nor made my benefits and my mercies motives to duty and obedience, but has fought against me with my own favours, and abused my blessings to my dishonour, therefore I will bring the Assyrian upon him, who, like an east wind, shall blast him, utterly dash all his hopes, spoil his treasures, and carry him into captivity: so that he who was some time the head of the nations, shall now become the tail; he that was above, and was the terror of the nations, making them tremble when he spake, shall now become the scorn of the nations, and the contempt of the people.

Obs. 1. God's goodness is wholly free. He chooses not for seniority of birth, or excellency of parts, or worthiness of the person, but he loves whom he loves, and shows mercy to whom he will show mercy, Rom. ix. 15. Ephraim here, the younger brother, is preferred before Manasseh, the elder, and is advanced in number and dignity above him. This displeased Joseph, and oft displeases us; but what pleases God should please us, we should quiet ourselves in such dispensations as our Saviour did, Matt. xi. 26, "Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight:" that is, since it is thy good pleasure to hide the mysteries of salvation from the wise men of the world, and to reveal them to simple men and women, it contents me well, because it is thy good pleasure so to have it. We are apt to confine God's grace to the order of nature, and external accomplishments. Amongst all the sons of Jesse, even Samuel the seer would not have chosen David, the youngest and the least regarded, and therefore set to keep sheep, to be king of Israel; yet God makes choice of him, and passes over his brothers Eliab, Shammah, and Abinadab, goodly persons, great soldiers, and prime courtiers. God's blessing goes not by carnal seniority, but by spiritual grace and choice. He is wiser than the wisest, and often chooses where man leaves, and leaves where man chooses, as we see in Abel, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, Joseph, who, although younger brethren, yet were preferred in favour before Cain, Japheth, Haran, Ishmael, Esau, Reuben, Simeon, Levi. This God does not only to magnify his sovereignty and free grace, but also to check our vain thoughts, who are apt to limit the Holy One of Israel to our ways and inventions.

See Jenkins on Jude.

Obs. 2. God's ministers must use plain and familiar expressions for the better convincing of their people, both of their sin and misery. The prophet here uses similitudes from a travelling woman, from the east wind; and the Lord, by way of aggravation of their sins, tells them that he had spoken to them by his prophets, and had "multiplied visions," and given them much preaching, yea, and the better to convince them, he had "used similitudes by the ministry of his prophets," Hos. xii. 10. This is an excellent way of preaching, and prevailing, it both notably illustrates the truth, and insinuates itself into men's affections. Galeacius Caracicius, an Italian marquis, and nephew to a pope, was converted by an apt similitude which he heard from Peter Martyr. Similitudes are more memorable, and suit best with the capacities of all; for thereby things are brought, 1. To our sense. 2. To our understanding. 3. To our memory. 4. To affection and practice. This made the prophets so frequently use them, Isa. v. 1, 2; Ezek. xvi. 3; Hos. xiv. 5-9. Nathan caught David with a parable, 2 Sam. xii. 1, 2, &c., and out of his own mouth condemned him. Christ, who spake as never man spake, whose words were full of power and authority, yet, the better to work upon his hearers, frequently used parables, from the sower, from leaven, from mustard-seed, flowers, feasts, from a treasure, &c., Matt. xiii.; xxiv. 32; Mark iv. 33; Luke xiii. 6; John xx. 6, 7, &c.

And the apostle Paul fetches similitudes from runners and wrestlers, &c., 1 Cor. ix. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 7.

We are naturally very incapable of the best things, 1 Cor. ii. 14, like a dull ass colt, untractable, Job xi. 12. We are slow to believe, and hard to perceive, the truths of God; Christ blamed his own disciples for it, Luke xxiv. 25. Plain preaching is the best teaching, it is the best way to convince and convert men; and if plain, familiar preaching will not work, certainly by dark, mysterious preaching it will never be effectual. Hence Christ tells Nicodemus, that if when he had spoken of earthly things they believed not, how will they believe when he shall speak to them of heavenly things? John iii. 12. This made Paul, that he had rather speak five words in a known tongue to edify others, than ten thousand in an unknown tongue, 1 Cor. xiv. 19. That is the best preaching which sets forth things to the life, and makes them as plain as if they were written with a sun-beam.

We should therefore admire the riches of God's mercy to us in descending to teach us so plainly and familiarly, using all means to convert us, and bring us home to himself; so that if any perish for want of knowledge, they may thank themselves, for God has left no means unessayed to do us good. He has used comparisons from things: 1. Natural. 2. Artificial. 3. Ceremonial. 4. Moral.

1. Natural. Thus, to show his tender love and care over his people, he alludes to a mother's love to her child, and to a hen, that with much tenderness gathers her chickens under her wings; and compares his people to "the apple of the eye," Psal. xvii. 8; Zech. ii. 8, which is guarded with many tunics, the better to preserve it from danger.

2. Artificial; from ploughing, sowing, silversmiths trying their metals in the fire, Psal. xii. 1; 1 Thess. v. 21.

3. Ceremonial. Psal. li. 7, "Purge me with hyssop," alluding to the cleansing of the lepers under the law.

4. Moral, Isa. lxvi. 12.

Many complain they are not book-learned. 1. Whose fault is that? thou canst not plead ignorance for want of means. 2. If thou couldst read never a letter, yet the book of the creature is written in such large characters, that he who runs may read them; had we but spiritual hearts, we might learn many spiritual lessons from them.

Obs. 3. The higher the mercy, the deeper the judgment if abused. "Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come." Fruitful Ephraim, that was the head of the tribes, and advanced above his brethren, is now for his sins made the most contemptible amongst them. Zanchy renders licet by quoniam, and understands the verse thus, Quoniam Ephraim fructificavit, &c. Seeing Ephraim is fruitful amongst his brethren, i. e. since he abounds in riches, power, and many privileges above the rest of the tribes, these shall be so far from saving him, that God will be more fierce against him for their abuse. Capernaum, that was exalted to heaven in the abundance of the means of grace, (for it was the city of Christ's residence, where he frequently cured the sick, preached, and wrought many miracles,) yet for ingratitude, unfruitfulness, and abuse of those means, was thrust down to hell; that is, it lost its privileges, and was brought to a very low and miserable condition; so that at this day the land is a desolation, not three houses standing where those three famous cities, Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum stood; and at last they shall be damned in hell too, for contemning so great salvation, when offered to them, Matt. xi. 23. As Ahasuerus said of Haman, who had abused his favour, Hang him on a gallows fifty cubits high, Esth. vii. 9; so will Christ say of such. Plunge them into hell so much deeper than others, because they rejected Christ when he was tendered to them. None sink so deep into hell as the lewd, licentious Christian. Favour abused increases sin, and men's offences are aggravated by their obligations. If Turks and Tartars shall be damned, debauched Christians shall be double damned, because they bring a reproach upon Christ and his ways, and open the mouths of the wicked to cry, Behold, these are the people of the Lord, see how loosely and unrighteously they live, Ezek. xxxvi. 20. Where the Lord has been a "valley of vision," and bestowed much preaching, if people answer not the Lord's cost, they must expect a burden of judgment to light upon them, Isa. xxiii. 1. No place was punished like Jerusalem, because no place had better preaching and more privileges, Lam. iv. 6; Dan. ix. 12. They that have preaching, shall one day know what it is to have had prophets amongst them, Ezek. ii. 5, and shall pay full dearly for their contempt of them, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16; Prov. i. 24—27; xxviii. 9; Isa. v. 24, 25; xxx. 9, 12, 13; Jer. vi. 19; ix. 12, 13; Zech. vii. 11, 12; Matt. x. 14, 15. This is the reason why judgments usually begin at "the sanctuary," Ezek. ix. 6, and at "the house of God," 1 Pet. iv. 17; Rom. ii. 9; though it end not there, but go on to the wicked. The cup begins at Jerusalem, and then goes round to Egypt, Uz, Ashkelon, Ekron, Edom, Moab, and to "all the kingdoms of the world, which are upon the face of the earth," Jer. xxv. 15—33. The highest in preferment are first in punishment; and if this be done to Zion, woe to Babylon, Jer. xlix.

12. The sins of God's people are committed against greater light and love, and bring more dishonour to God, and disgrace to his truth, than the sins of others; and therefore of all men he will not spare them for their iniquities, as we see in Moses, Eli, David, Hezekiah, Zacharias, 1 Sam. ii. 27—30; 2 Sam. xii. 14; Luke i. 20. They are a people nearer to him than others, and therefore he will not bear with them as he does with those that know him not, Lev. x. 2, 3; Numb. xvi. 9; Amos iii. 2. A father will sooner correct his children if they offend, than strangers whom he does not know, Heb. xii. 5, 6. We can endure dung in our fields, which we cannot abide in our parlours. We suffer those briars to grow in the wilderness, which we cannot away with in our gardens. If they be open enemies, God can better bear it; but it highly provokes him to be wounded in the house of his friends; when he shall nourish and bring up children, and they shall rebel against him, he cannot, he will not, brook it, Isa. i. 2, 7. 1. To show his impartial justice to the world; 2. For the terror of others; 3. To take off the scandal that comes hereby to religion; he will punish sin wherever he finds it, Numb. x. 12. He has his fire in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem, and is terrible in the assembly of his saints, Psal. lxxviii. 35.

Obs. 4. No privileges nor prerogatives can preserve a disobedient people from ruin. Ephraim here had many privileges, as you may see, Gen. xlviii. 16, 19, 20; Deut. xxxiii. 13—17, where, under the name of Joseph, Moses blesses Ephraim with the precious things of the heavens above, and the precious things of the earth beneath, as corn, wine, gold, silver, &c., and prophecies that the good will of him that dwelt in the bush should dwell amongst them; that is, God would show his special love to them as his peculiar people, and not only give them outward, but inward blessings also, and would so strengthen them, that no enemy should be able to stand before them; yet Ephraim, sinning against the God of those mercies, lost all. No privileges can shelter us if God be against us. He that raised us, can as easily ruin us; he that exalted us, can as easily abuse us; he that made us famous for mercies, can quickly make us infamous for judgments, and consume us after he has done us good,

Professio religionis non avertit delictum, sed auget. Salvia.

Josh. xxiv. 20. It is not silver, nor gold, Prov. xi. 4; Ezek. vii. 19; Zeph. i. 18, not men, nor might, that can save us, if God be against us, Psal. xx. 7, 8; Isa. xxii. 6—14; Nah. iii. 12. Many trust in their swords, and think by their valour and skill in war to defend themselves, and possess the land as their inheritance for ever; but God tells them, since they trust in the sword, that they shall fall by the sword, and be cast out of all. Ezek. xxxiii. 26—28. If he be against us, all is against us; and if he but stamp or hiss for an enemy, they presently come against us, Isa. v. 26. Jerusalem was strongly fortified, and no man thought that ever the enemy could have entered it, Lam. iv. 12; and if privileges could ever have preserved a sinful people from ruin, Jerusalem had never been destroyed, for they had more privileges than all the people in the world besides. It was called "the perfection of beauty," and "the joy of the whole earth;" "the city of God," Psal. xlv. 4; "the city of the great King," Matt. v. 35. So famous was it for preaching, that it is called "the valley of vision," Isa. xxii. 1; and they were called, a peculiar people, a holy people, a people near to God, that knew his name, and were blessed by him above all people. They had godly magistrates, as David, Hezekiah, Josiah, &c., and zealous prophets, as Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, &c., and afterwards, Christ and his apostles. To them pertained "the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came:" these eight privileges the apostle sets down together, Rom. ix. 4, 5. None better seated, none more strangely delivered, none had such signal providences, and glorious ordinances; all the world besides lay in darkness, they only were a Goshen, a land of light, God's glory, his pleasant portion, and delight, &c. So that if any people under heaven might have been secure in respect of privileges, it was Jerusalem; yet they, falling to atheism, idolatry, persecution of God's messengers, &c., are become a desolation. Sodom was a beautiful place, like the paradise of God, Gen. xiii. 10; Babylon was "the glory of kingdoms," Isa. xiii. 19; yet both the one and the other were destroyed for their lewdness and pride.

England is apt to boast of its privileges, and to tell what great things God has done for us. With thankfulness it must be acknowledged that God has done great things for us indeed: he has made us, as he did Ephraim here, the head of the nations, when for our sins we might have been the tail; he has set us above, when for our horrid apostacies, and hideous blasphemies, he might justly have laid us beneath; he has made us the terror of the nations, and given us victory upon victory, success upon success, and has prospered us by sea and land, blessed us with the best laws, and the best land (all things considered) in the world; and, as if all this had not been sufficient for us, he has given us the word and the sword, Moses and Aaron, magistracy and ministry, the best (I think) in the world. Besides the singular helps in print, those excellent tracts, both polemical and practical; compare but our large Annotations with the Dutch Annotations, and you will see what cause we have to be thankful in that respect.

All these things make us deeply indebted to our God; but had we ten thousand times more privileges than we have, yet if we walk not up to them, and answer them with obedience, we are an undone people. The greater our privileges, the nearer to judgment, if we abuse them. Shiloh was for a time privileged with the tabernacle and the ark, those visible pledges of God's special presence and residence amongst them; but they, abusing these mercies, were given up to judgments, Jer. vii. 12; and if England go on in sinning, as it has done of late, and proceed in its hypocrisy, blasphemy, apostacy, heresy, formality, profaneness, and abuse of God's favours, we must certainly expect some sweeping judgment. It is not privileges, it is not circumcision, nor uncircumcision, it is not those outward prerogatives, that make us acceptable to God, but a new creature, Gal. vi. 15; either new men, or no men in God's esteem. Let us then become a holy people, and we shall be a happy people. Let us answer our privileges with self-denying hearts and lives, that as God has done more for us than for others, so we may do more for him than others; that as he has given us distinguishing mercies, so we may answer them with distinguishing manners, not living like the men of the world, that the Lord may rejoice over us to do us good, and may show us yet greater things than these, Exod. xix. 4, 5.

Obs. 5. Abuse of mercies forfeits mercies. God had done much for Ephraim; he had not been to him a barren wilderness, or a land that was not sown, but he brought him out of the wilderness, miraculously delivered him out of Egypt, freely adopted him for his own, planted him in a fat pasture, even a land flowing with milk and honey, gave him his law, and sent to them many extraordinary prophets; but they, instead of exalting God, who had exalted them, grew proud and insolent, forgetting the God of all their mercies, and confiding in kings and princes, kissing the calves, and sacrificing to Baal, who could not save them, and then they died, Hos. xiii. 1—12. When they began to fight against God with his own mercies, and to abuse the health, wealth, and blessings which God had given them, to the dishonour of the Donor, then they lost their riches, strength, glory, kingdom, and all; then comes the Assyrian, like an east wind, and sweeps away all. Before his name was Ephraim, fruitfulness, but now God threatens them with emptiness, barrenness, dryness of roots, fruits, branches, springs, even the loss of all. As all the world had been witnesses of God's special favour to them, so now they should be witnesses of their just confusion. When men honour not the Lord with their riches, but kiss their own hands, and sacrifice to their own nets; when, like beasts, they bite the hand that feeds them, and crop the tree that shelters them, it is just with God to take all from them, Hos. ii. 8, 9. In Neh. ix. 7—23, we have a large catalogue of God's singular mercies. Ver. 26, we read how they abused those mercies; and then, ver. 27, 28, we read of God's judgments on them for abusing those blessings. So Psal. evi. 9—11, we see God's mercies; ver. 13—39, we have the abuse of them; and ver. 40—42, the consequent judgments. It is usually seen, that where the Lord bestows the greatest mercies, there he oft receives the greatest indignities; where he gives most honour, there he receives most dishonour. When Jeshurun is fat and full, then he kicks, Deut. xxxii. 15. Ephraim here was a son, and had all the privileges of a son; the greater then was his sin to rebel against that God who had been so tender to him. He had,

1. Dilection. "When Israel was a child, then I loved him," Hos. xi. 1, 4.

2. Direction. "I taught Ephraim also to go," and sent Jonah, Amos, Hosea, and other prophets to instruct him, Hos. xi. 3.

3. Correction. As a father corrects his children for their good, so did God by Ephraim, Hos. v. 15; vi. 1, 2.

4. Provision. Fathers provide for their children; so did God for Ephraim: "I did know thee in the wilderness, in the land of great drought. According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled," Hos. xiii. 5, 6.

5. Protection. He was their King, who saved them from their enemies: "I will be thy king: where is any other that may save thee in all thy cities?" Hos. xiii. 10.

God has done as great things for England (all things considered) as ever he did for Ephraim; he has been a tender Father to us, he has blessed us abundantly both in church and state; he has broken the power and policy of many subtle Ahithophels and great Zanzummims, giants, and sons of Anak. He has made mountains a plain before us; and though fierce men have ridden over our heads, yet has he brought us through fire and water into a wealthy place. For England's sake he has sent to Babylon, and brought down all their nobles: he has bound even kings and princes in chains, and their followers in links of iron. He has made the wicked to bow before the good, and the evil at the gates of the righteous. No nation so blessed of our God as we, and no nation that has worse requited the Lord's blessings than we have done. As he has loaded us with mercies, so we have loaded him with blasphemies, heresies, apostacies; no favours can win us, no benefits bind us; if God had been our deadly enemy, we could not have acted more ignobly and disingenuously against him than we have done. It is a miracle of mercy that he yet continues his mercies to us, and that he has not long ago stripped us naked, as in the day when we were born, Hos. ii. 3. We have rendered evil to the Lord for all his goodness to us, and therefore we may justly fear that evil should pursue us, Prov. xvii. 13. If he shall be punished that renders evil for evil to man, what shall be done to him that renders evil for good, and that to his God who never did him hurt? The good Lord humble us for all our ungrateful and disingenuous walking before him, who has been so good and gracious to us; and grant, that at last we may know and acknowledge the God of our mercies, lest an east wind come and bereave us of all; for though at present we have peace and plenty, and fresh springs of mercy round about us, yet God can suddenly dry up all our springs, and bring a plundering Assyrian from the east or west upon us, (for those metaphorical winds, as well as the natural, are all his servants,) that shall quickly rob us of all our pleasant things. Let us not therefore flatter ourselves, and think that because at present we have peace, therefore no evil shall come upon us; for if England go on to sin after the rate as it has done of late years, adding drunkenness to thirst, sin to sin, and heresy to heresy, &c., the wrath of the Lord will certainly break forth against us; and then we that would not serve him gladly and sincerely in the abundance of all things, shall be made to serve in want and misery, that we may know the difference between his service, and the service of men, Deut. xxviii. 47, 48.

Obs. 6. The judgments of God are irresistible. Let Ephraim be deeply rooted like a tree, or well founded like a tower, yet, if ever this east wind of God's displeasure do arise, it will pull him up by the roots, blow him down, and carry him into captivity, carry him into scarcity, carry him into infamy, yea, carry him to death, and then to hell. If the Lord gives but the word of command, he has winds in store to carry us into any of those sad coasts. Though great men are rooted in the earth like great mountains, (in their own conceit, and in the opinion of others,) yet they are but like tennis-balls in the hands of God, which he hurls at pleasure which way he pleases, as is excellently set forth, Isa. xxii. 18. With a word of his mouth he can speak his enemies into confusion; he can with more ease destroy them, than we can crush a moth in our windows, or tread a worm to death under our feet. How easily and irresistibly does a bar of iron break an earthen pot to pieces! Psal. ii. 9. There is not the least creature but is too strong for us, if God set it on. He did not vex Egypt with lions and leopards, but with grasshoppers, frogs, flies, and lice, to show his almighty, irresistible power, who can punish us by the most contemptible creatures. Thus he slew Popelcius and Hatto by rats and mice, Hermonactes was stung to death with bees, Pope Adrian was choked with a fly, Cassander was eaten with lice, Antiochus and Herod with worms. Thus we see God's omnipotency, and man's impotency, and must learn to fear him who is able to arm the least and weakest of his creatures, and make it strong enough to encounter and conquer sinful man.

Obs. 7. Cruel enemies are God's rod. They come not by chance, or of their own accord, but the Assyrian here is sent by God as the rod of his indignation against rebellious Ephraim; hence he is called "the wind of the Lord," as being more immediately sent by him. So Isa. x. 5—7, 15, the Assyrian is called God's "rod," "staff," "axe," "saw," with which God chastises "an hypocritical nation" they can do nothing without a hand to move them. There is no evil in this kind, but it comes from God, Isa. xlii. 24, 25; xlv. 7; liv. 16; Jer. li. 20; Lam. iii. 1, 37; Amos iii. 6; Hab. i. 6. Hence Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, is called God's "servant," Jer. xxv. 9, whom he employed in his service for the correction of his people; and the wicked are called his "sword," Psal. xvii. 13. As the winds natural, so the winds metaphorical, are all at God's command, sent by him as executors of his wrath upon a sinful people, Lev. xxi. 25; Ezek. xiv. 17, 22.

But how can it stand with the justice of God to use such wicked, blasphemous instruments?

He that brings light out of darkness, and good out of evil, can make good use even of the sins of men. As a wise physician can so order poison, that it shall become a medicine, and can expel poison by poison; so the most wise God can extract good out of the evilings of those evil ones, and what they intend for evil, he by his over-ruling providence disposes unto good.

For the clearing of this, we must take notice of a fourfold act of God in the actions of wicked men. There is an act, then,

1. Of inspection, whereby he sees all that is done, Job xxxiv. 21, 22; Psal. xciv. 7, 9.

2. Of permission, whereby he does actively suffer that to be done, which he has power to hinder, Psal. lxxxix. 40—42.

3. Of limitation or restraint, whereby he keeps in the wicked so that they cannot do any thing more or less than he will have done, Gen. xx. 6; Job i. 12.

4. Of direction and order, whereby the evil actions of wicked men (which are in themselves evil) are, by his most wise disposing and overruling providence, turned to good, Gen. xiv. 5, 7, 8; 1. 20; Acts ii. 23, 24. The devil, Judas, Pilate, and the Jews, had ends of their own in crucifying Christ, but God had an end above their ends, and a plot above their plots, to which all their plots (though against their intents) were subservient. They did fulfil God's decrees against their wills.

But if they do only that which God foresees, permits, limits, and disposes, how can they be said to sin, and why does God punish them since they fulfil his will?

Because they do it not in obedience to God, but out of malice, covetousness, and self-ends, &c. Whatever they pretend, yet they intend nothing less than the doing of God's work, and the fulfilling of his will. Their end is to satisfy their lusts, to enlarge their borders by the conquest of countries and the spoils of the people, Isa. x. 7. This may,

1. Awe us; since in war we have not to do with men only, but it is God who is mighty in power, and terrible in judgment, that comes against us. If we had only to do with potsherds of the earth we might make some resistance, but when the Creator shall come against the creature, Omnipotency against impotency, who can stand? Isa. xlv. 9. He is the Lord of hosts, and if he be against us, the hosts of heaven and the hosts of earth are against us also.

See Carst on Job, Jer. xlv. on Jude, Mantion on Jude.

2. Comfort us in the midst of all our sufferings by the hands of cruel men, that yet they are but God's rods to chastise us for our good. Even they are his servants, and can do nothing without a commission from our Father, John xix. 11. They cannot curse where God does not curse, Numb. xxiii. 8. The very devil their master is chained and limited, and cannot devour whom he will, but only whom he may, that is, whom God permits him to devour. We are apt, like curs, to bite the stone, and not look at the hand that threw it, whereas we should always look at the hand of God in all our distresses (whatever the instruments be); then we shall be dumb and silent, when we see that it is God that has done it, Gen. i. 20; Job i. 21; Psal. xxxix. 9; 1 Cor. x. 13. The wicked are but God's scullions to cleanse us, his files to furbish us and scour off our rust, his millers to grind us, and make us fit manchet for our Lord's use. The Chaldeans were cruel persecutors, yet the Lord sends his people into the land of Chaldea for their good; he makes them to learn that many times in Babylon, which they would never have done in Zion, Jer. xxiv. 5. God can make a medicine of these vipers, and can dispose the worst things to his people's good, Rom. viii. 28. Their very persecutions shall spread the gospel, Acts viii. 1; Phil. i. 12, 19. So that in some sense we are beholden to our enemies, for they make us better.

3. Comfort us also, inasmuch as when those rods have done their work, themselves shall be burnt, Isa. x. 24—2. After Pharaoh had done God's work on Israel, God drowns him. After the Assyrian had done God's work upon his people, the Babylonians come and destroy him, and his flourishing empire, Nah. i. 2, 3. God suffers them for a time to vent their sin and malice, that his justice may be the more apparent in their downfall.

Obs. 8. Sin bereaves us of our most pleasant, precious, and desirable things. So, Jer. xv. 13; xx. 5; and Isa. lxiv. 11, where the church complains, that "all our pleasant things are laid waste." In which words, mark, 1. The generality of their loss; not some, but "all;" all their treasures, all their princes, all their palaces, all their riches, all their cities, sin had ruined all. 2. Their propriety in them; "our" pleasant things. To see another suffer, it may affect us, but not so deeply as when we ourselves suffer. 3. The excellency of the things which they lost; they were "pleasant" and desirable things. To lose base, contemptible things does not so much trouble us, but to lose our choicest things goes near us. 4. Which aggravates all, here is, 1. Conflagration, "Our holy and our beautiful house is burnt with fire." 2. A devastation and desolation, all is "laid waste."

So long as Ephraim was Ephraim, that is, faithful and fruitful, he flourished; but now that he had forsaken God, God forsook him, and lets in an east wind that destroys all. He that before was famous, and the head of the tribes, is now, since he has found out falsehood, and new lights, and new gods, become infamous, and the footstool of the tribes. So Hos. xiii. 1, "When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died:" that is, 1. When Ephraim spake trembling, or with trembling, (as it is in the original,) he was afraid of sin. Or, 2. When Ephraim spake, there was trembling; that is, he was once very awful to the rest of the tribes, so that when he spake, the rest of the tribes were ready to tremble. But when once he fell to idolatry, and worshipped Baal, he lost his reputation, and no reckoning was made of him. He that before was formidable, is now become contemptible both with God and man, at home and abroad. Now every paltry adversary tramples upon him without control, as the fearful hare on a dead lion. See thus how Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, insults over Ahab, who had "sold himself to work wickedness:" 1 Kings xx. 3, 4, "Thy silver and thy gold is mine; thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine. And the king of Israel answered and said, My lord, O king, according to thy saying, I am thine, and all that I have." Look, as the worried cur falls upon his back, and turns up all fours, as craving quarter, so did this sordid idolater crouch to his enemy; when God was departed from him, he was even as a dead carcass. Whilst Israel kept close to God, and walked in his way, neither Balak nor Balaam, neither the devil nor his agents, could by their enchantments hurt them; but when by the wicked counsel of Balaam they were enticed to sin against God by committing whoredom with the daughters of Moab, then God's wrath breaks forth against them, and they die for it, Numb. xxv. 1; xxxi. 16. Hence a heathen could say, It is our sins that weaken our armies, and make them fly before their enemies.

As all good is in God, the chiefest good, who is therefore called a sun for consolation, and a shield for protection, and the God of all comfort both inclusively and exclusively, Psal. lxxxiv. 11; 2 Cor. i. 3; so all the evil in the world may be seen in sin, which is the chiefest evil, as poverty, sickness, war, death, hell. Sin dries up all our springs, stops our fountains, spoils our treasures, and robs us of all our pleasant things; our pleasant land, our pleasant food, our pleasant raiment, our pleasant houses, pleasant children, sin, sin, sin bereaves us of them all. God turns "a fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein," Psal. cvii. 34; and therefore when anything goes amiss with us, we should search for the sin that has done us the mischief; find out the Achan that has caused the trouble; find out the Jonah that has raised the storm; do justice on the one, and drown the other, and we shall have peace. We should slay that which otherwise will slay us, and ruin iniquity, which ruins our houses, lands, wives, children, "all our pleasant things." It is this enemy that robs us of our health, wealth, peace, plenty, ordinances, magistrates, ministers, and all our comforts.

You may say, We will hide our treasures that none shall find them. But mark, there is no hiding of yourselves, or substance, when God pursues, Jer. xi. 11. The wind of the Lord will pierce into the most secret places, and find out you, and all your hid treasures, Psal. xxi. 8; cxxxix. 7, 8; Isa. xiii. 16, 17; Amos ix. 2—4. God has those that watch for your riches, Jer. iv. 16, 17; and greedy soldiers that shall search for your hid treasures, Isa. x. 13, 14; xlv. 3; Obad. 6.

Let us then wean our hearts from those flying, fading, transitory things. What the prophet said of riches, "If they increase, set not your hearts upon them," may be fitly applied to all creature comforts; if friends increase, set not your hearts upon them; if children increase, or honours, or armies, or pleasant habitations, &c., yet set not your hearts upon them, but look upon them as things that have wings to fly from us in our greatest need. Lie loose, therefore, in your affections to all earthly enjoyments, that so whenever the Lord shall call for them by fire, sword, or any other way, it may not trouble you to part with them; make not idols of them in over-loving them, lest you lose them. It is great folly greedily to lay up treasures for we know not whom, Psal. xxxix. 6; Jer. xvii. 11; it may be for an enemy, as Ephraim here: little did he think that the mercileas Assyrian should be enriched with his labours, and that the men whom their souls hated should be masters of all their desirable and pleasant things.

Since earthly things are so uncertain and fading,

*Nostris peccatis
barbari fortes sunt,
nostris peccatis.
Romanus superatur
exercitum.*

"Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven," Matt. vi. 19, 20. Lay out your estates for God, his truth, his cause, his people, and the spiritual good of you and yours. This is to lay up treasures in heaven. Get grace, that is durable riches which will never leave you, and that better part which shall never be taken from you.

Ver. 16. Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword: their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up.

This verse contains the end of the sermon, and of the chapter, and therefore those interpreters do ill who make it to begin the next chapter, when this verse fitly coheres with the precedent verse: there the prophet showed how they should be plundered and lose their goods, here he tells them how they should be butchered and lose their lives. So that the prophet does not here begin a new sermon, but only confirms what he had spoken before of the destruction of Samaria, and the overthrow of the whole kingdom. So that the words are a clear and concluding exposition of the former similes; wherein we have,

1. The dismal downfall of Samaria, "Samaria shall become desolate," חרבה יהיה שומרון. The prophet labours to awaken them by foretelling the greatness of their punishment.

2. The meritorious cause of this sad destruction, viz. her rebellion, "for she hath rebelled." So that she has no cause to complain of God, as if he dealt hardly with her, for her own rebellion is the true cause of her destruction, and her great provocation has brought this upon her; as the church in the like case complains, "The Lord is righteous" in sending sword, plague, and famine upon us, "for I have rebelled against his commandment." Lam. i. 18.

3. The aggravation of this their rebellion; it was not against man, but against God, yea, against "her God" in covenant, who had been so good and gracious to her both in temporals and spirituals, yet she most ignominiously casts off him, and prefers the calves, Hos. xiii. 2.

4. The manner of their destruction, or what kind of death they shall die, and that is by the sword, "they shall fall by the sword." They shall not only lose their treasure, and their land, but their lives also. He says not, all shall fall, but indefinitely יפלו "they shall fall;" that is, many of the inhabitants of Samaria, and of the kingdom of Israel, shall be slain by the Assyrian.

5. The better yet to awaken them out of their security, he sets forth the rage of the Assyrian, with its aggravations, telling them, "their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up." They should not only die themselves, but their little ones also should perish with them.

"Samaria shall become desolate." Samaria was built by Omri, king of Israel, who "bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of the city which he built, after the name of Shemer, owner of the hill, Samaria," 1 Kings xvi. 24. It was the royal city, even the chief city of the kings of Israel, where they kept their court, and had their special residence; there they reigned, and there they were buried. This was the metropolis, or mother city; all the other cities of the kingdom of Israel were called the daughters of Samaria, Ezek. xvi. 46, 55. In Augustus Cæsar's time, it was called Se-baste, and not long after was totally ruined. And here let it be noted once for all, that when the prophets speak of the ten tribes only, sometimes they call them Samaria, sometimes Ephraim, and sometimes Israel, Joseph, Jezreel, Beth-el, Beth-aven; but when they speak of the two tribes, they usually do it under the name of Judah, Jerusalem, Benjamin, and the house of David.

Samaria was a populous, strong, well-fortified city, there were in it horses, and chariots, and armour, 2 Kings x. 1, 2. It was every way well prepared to hold out against an enemy, as appears by the three years' siege of that potent enemy which lay against it; yet, notwithstanding all the fortifications, Samaria shall be made desolate, because of her sin. Samaria is here put for the inhabitants of Samaria, viz. the Israelites, and synecdochically for the whole kingdom of Israel, as distinct from the kingdom of Judah. The prophet names only Samaria, because it was the prime city, and all the rest were taken before; there was none left but Samaria, and sin brings down that also. This city was twice besieged, first by the Syrians in Ahab's time, 1 Kings xx. 1; 2 Kings vi. 24; and now by the Assyrians. Pul and Tiglath-pileser had before molested Israel, 2 Kings xv. 19, 29, and now comes Shalmaneser, a third king of Assyria. He besieges Samaria in the days of Hoshea, the last king of Israel; he takes it, and carries the inhabitants into captivity, from which they never returned, but were totally rooted up, having continued, from Jeroboam their first king, about two hundred and sixty years.

"For she hath rebelled against her God." The Lord had used all means to reclaim them, his Spirit had long striven with them in the ministry of those prophets which he had in compassion sent amongst them, as Jehu, Semaiah, Azariah, with Elijah, Elisha, Joel, Jonah, Amos, Micah, and specially this our prophet Hosea. How plainly does he tell them throughout his prophecy, of their idolatry, apostacy, ingratitude, and of the judgments which were coming on them for those sins! yet nothing will work upon them, but they persist obstinately in their sins, and therefore the Lord resolves to pour out his fury on them. Since they had embittered his soul with their sins, and given him gall who had given them honey, and given him wormwood for his milk, therefore he now resolves to send on them bitter punishments, Hos. xii. 14.

"They shall fall by the sword;" that is, they shall die by the sword; so the phrase is frequently taken in Scripture, as Lev. xxvi. 7, 8; Numb. xiv. 3, 43; 2 Sam. i. 12; P'sal. lxxviii. 64; Ezek. v. 12; Hos. vii. 16.

"Their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up." This sets forth the great rage and fury of the barbarous Assyrians, and withal implies the greatness of Samaria's sin, which provoked God to so great wrath. They should spare neither old nor young, no mercy should be showed to women or children, no sex, no age should escape unpunished; their little infants and sucklings, which usually are spared, yet now shall be dashed in pieces. Soldiers are wont to show mercy to women and children, unless sorely provoked; the Assyrians had besieged Samaria three years, and therefore they dealt the more severely with them. Fenced cities sometimes hold out long, but when taken they generally suffer much. Of such brutish inhumanity we read, 2 Kings xv. 16, where the tyrant Menahem ripped the infants of Tiphshah out of their mothers' wombs, because their fathers "opened not to him." These examples in no wise justify, much less excuse, the malicious cruelty of wicked men who despitefully slay the godly with their seed; such cursed Edomites shall surely and suitably pay for it, Psal. cxxxvii. 7; Amos i. 13. The Assyrians, who here dash in pieces Ephraim's children, had at last, by way of retaliation, their own so served, Nah. iii. 10.

חרבה יהיה שומרון desolabitur a 24 desolati, devastati, perire, quia peccatum est desolationis causa. A Lap. Longhi Crit. S.

רבו significant rebellare, apostatate, excedere, et ad amaritudinem convertere. Ruth l. 20, Lam. l. 18.

Cadit et Riphra justissimus unus qui fuit in Tiphra. Virg.

The sum of all is this: O people of Israel, I have often told you what you will not believe, that your destruction is near; therefore now know, that whether you believe it or not, yet God will certainly and suddenly execute what he has decreed, and fulfil what he has spoken by me; neither have you any cause to complain of cruelty in God, since it is your own rebellion which has brought this judgment on your own heads. There have been no means wanting on God's part to do you good, he has sent his prophets rising early and coming late unto you. He would have cured you, but ye would not be cured, and therefore now ye shall never be purged; but your chief city, with the regions round about it, shall be made a desolation, your men shall fall by the sword, yea, your women and little children shall die without mercy.

Obs. 1. God usually warns before he smites. He sends Hosea to tell them before, "Samaria shall become desolate." He speaks before he strikes, and denounces judgments before he executes them. Seldom does he send any great judgment against his own people, but he tells them of it first. He lightens before he thunders, shoots off his warning pieces before his murdering pieces, and hangs out the white flag of mercy before the black flag of destruction. He deals not with us, as one did with Diogenes, who first brake his head, and then bid him take heed. But he first admonishes us to repent; thus he did to the seven churches of Asia before their destruction, Rev. ii. 5. He first cuts men down with the sword of his mouth, before he cuts them down with the sword of his hand, Hos. vi. 5. He first blows the trumpet, (and commands men so to do, Deut. xx. 10—12,) before he sends the sword, Hos. v. 8, 9; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16; Jer. vii. 25; xxvi. 18; Joel ii. 1; Amos iv. 12; Zeph. ii. 1—3. Sometimes God warns,

1. By extraordinary and immediate revelation. Thus he warned the wise men that came to Christ not to go to Herod, but to return to their own country another way, Matt. ii. 12.

2. By prodigious signs and comets. These are the usual forerunners of some judgment approaching. They have a voice as well as the word; if they will not hearken to the voice of the first sign, yet they will believe the voice of the second, Exod. iv. 8. Christ tells us, that before the destruction of Jerusalem, there should be many fearful sights and signs, Luke xxi. 11, 25. And Josephus affirms, that before its destruction, for a whole year's space there appeared a comet like a sword. Before our German wars, there appeared a blazing comet in 1618.

3. By his ministers, Ezek. xxxiii. 2, 7, 8. Thus he warned the old world, a hundred and twenty years, by the preaching of Noah, before he drowned it, Gen. vi. 13. Before the destruction of Jerusalem, he sent Christ himself and his apostles to call them to repentance.

4. By his lesser judgments. 1. He comes as a moth, which eats one thread now, and another anon, and without any noise devours all. 2. As a worm, or rottenness, which eats out the heart of the strongest oak. 3. If that will not do, there lies a lion that tears all in pieces without resistance, Hos. v. 12, 14.

5. By his rods on others, as on the Palatinate and Savoy, &c.; so he sent the Jews to Shiloh, Jer. vii. 12: also by taking away eminent magistrates and zealous ministers, Isa. iii. 1—6.

6. By the motions of his Spirit; he knocks at the door of our hearts, and warns us to return, Rev. iii. 20.

And this he does, 1. In mercy to his people, that they might prepare to meet him, and so prevent his judgments; as those that believed the threatening of the hail, housed themselves and their cattle, and so were saved, Exod. ix. 18—21. He deals not with us like an enemy, who surprises his adversary unawares; but, like a faithful friend, he tells us of the storm approaching, that we might hide ourselves from it, 2 Chron. xii. 5—7; Job xxii. 29; Hab. iii. 16.

2. For the manifestation of his justice upon the wicked, who shall be made inexcusable, in that they had such fair warning given them, but they would not take it. Nineveh, at the preaching of one Jonah, repented and escaped; the Lord be merciful to England! how many hundreds of Jonahs have we had to call us to repentance, and yet we turn not, but fall away more and more! It is a sad aggravation of men's sins, and puts a sore sting into men's troubles, when conscience shall fly in their faces and say, Thou wast foretold of such judgments, and forewarned of such such miseries, but thou contemnedst the voice of thy teachers, and didst set at nought all their counsels; and therefore now thou must expect no more pity or patience from God, but mayst justly expect that he should fulfil the word which he spake by his servants against thee.

Let then his warnings win thee, and his patience and long-suffering lead thee to repentance. Let not his admonitions be always lost upon thee. Be not still secure and senseless, like Lot's sons-in-law, who, when he warned them of danger approaching, "seemed as one that mocked," Gen. xix. 14; but how soon did they find that he was in earnest! So Isa. v. 19, they mocked at the prophet that told them of captivity and judgment, and bid him let them see the things he spake of; and they did so to their sorrow. And is it not so in our days? when we tell people of judgment approaching, and ready to seize upon them, they look upon it as some vain dream or melancholy fancy, till they are made to feel the contrary. See how dreadfully God threatens such secure, unbelieving sinners, Deut. xxix. 19—21.

Believe his timely warnings. Without faith all warnings are ineffectual; it is only Noah, that by faith feared and built an ark, that was saved, both he and his household, Heb. xi. 7.

Obs. 2. The ministers of God must apply the word to their people. The prophet preaches at Samaria against the sins of Samaria, and tells them to their faces, that for their rebellion they shall be made a desolation. Thus did all the prophets; they made Jerusalem to know her abominations, Isa. lviii. 1; Ezek. xvi. 2. So did Christ himself apply the word particularly to his hearers, Matt. xi. 21, 23; xxiii. 37, 38; John iv. 17, 18; so did the apostles, Acts ii. 36, 37. This is the only way to convince and convert men; what is spoken generally to all, few will apply to themselves, Quod dicitur omni, dicitur nulli.

Be not then offended at the plain and powerful preaching of the word. A plaister that is not applied, will never heal. A minister shall never profit his people, till he apply the word to their particular cases. Those whom the Lord intends for conversion, by his Spirit he sets the word so home upon their hearts, that they think the minister knows even all their secret thoughts.

Obs. 3. Judgments seldom go alone. Ephraim was plundered before, but now he must be butchered; before he lost his goods, now his life must go, which is more precious than all pleasant things, Job ii. 4. How oft do we read of sword, plague, famine, those three arrows of God, shot together against a rebellious people, Ezek. xiv. 21. As sins seldom go alone, so neither do judgments: see what a concatenation and chain of judgments is set down together, Deut. xxviii. 15—68.

*Calamitas dicitur ventura ad agros populo parviflorum
non veniat. Jerome.*

God wants not variety of judgments to inflict upon a sinful people, that they may know what a sad and bitter thing it is that they have provoked him. Pharaoh had ten plagues one after another. The trumpets and the vials in the Revelation came not single, but by sevens, bringing in mischief upon mischief, and plague upon plague, till he had consumed them, Deut. xxxi. 17; Jer. li. 31, 32.

Obs. 4. When lesser judgments do not mend a people, God usually comes with greater. If plundering will not mend Ephraim, desolation shall end him, Hos. v. 12, 14. When Chedorlaomer had plundered Sodom, and that did not better them, Gen. xiv. 11, at last comes fire from heaven and consumes them, Gen. xix. When gentle physic will not work out the peccant humour, the physician applies stronger. If gentle correction will not mend our children, we double our strokes. If one beating will not mend a people, God will plague them yet seven times more according to their sins, Lev. xxvi. 21, 24; Isa. i. 5; Jer. v. 3, 6. When no judgments will work upon Pharaoh, then he is drowned. When temporal judgments do not mend a people, he sends them to eternal. It is an ill sign when men are incorrigible under judgments, and become the worse for beating, Isa. ix. 13. Ahaz had a brand set upon him, to warn all others to take heed of this sinning sin: "In the time of his distress did he trespass yet more against the Lord: this is that king Ahaz." That king, that wicked, infamous, irreligious king, who "sacrificed to the gods of Damascus, which smote him." What madness is this, to serve such as beat their servants for their pains, and ruin them! for so it follows, "They were the ruin of him, and of all Israel," 2 Chron. xxviii. 22, 23.

Desperate sores must have desperate cures. Hard knots must have hard wedges. "Fitches are beaten out with a staff," but the cummin must have a rod, Isa. xxviii. 27. When the Lord had used all means to bring Israel to repentance, when he had sent blasting, plague, famine, and sword upon them, and yet they were impenitent, Amos iv. 6—11, he proceeds there in ver. 12, to tell them that now he would deal more sharply and severely with them. "Therefore thus will

I do unto thee," i. e. thus terribly, thus dreadfully, in a more fierce and furious manner than ever: "Therefore thus will I do unto thee, O Israel: and because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel." There is no meeting him in a way of opposition, or rising up against him; (for who ever hardened himself against God and prospered?) but meet him in a way of humiliation and repentance with prayers and tears, despatch those messengers to meet him on the way whilst he is afar off, that you may prevent the execution of God's wrath. A lion will not seize on a yielding prey; the bending reed is preserved, when the stubborn oak is pulled up by the roots, Isa. ii. 11, 12, &c. By this means we shall either remove the judgment, or get it sanctified, so that all shall be for good unto us, or else God will take us away, as he did Josiah, before the evil comes. We shall escape those trials we cannot bear, and be enabled to undergo those trials which we cannot escape.

Obs. 5. Eminent places oftentimes are eminent in sin. In great cities there usually are great sinners. Jerusalem was a great city, and what great abominations were in it! murder, oppression, bribery, profanation of sabbaths and holy things, her princes were roaring lions, her judges ravening wolves, and the priests did violence to the law, Ezek. xxii. Babylon was a famous, wealthy, populous city, yet full of cruelty and pride, full of witchcraft and fornication, both corporal and spiritual, Jer. l. 31—38. The cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were full of crying sins, as pride, idleness, gluttony, inhumanity, and notorious uncleanness. And here in the text Samaria was full of idolatry and rebellion against God, 1 Kings xiii. 32; Isa. x. 10, 11; Hos. viii. 5: the lesser cities were called the daughters of Samaria, Ezek. xvi. 46, and those were like their mother. Great cities have great influence upon their neighbour towns; if they be idolatrous, superstitious, riotous, proud, profane, so will the places round about them be; if great Babylon be a harlot, she will quickly become "the mother of harlots and abominations," Rev. xvii. 5. We should not therefore desire to live in such populous places, (unless we be called by God to them, for then he will keep us, as he did Lot in Sodom,) but to go and live in them without a call, only for pleasure, or to see fashions, &c., is a sore temptation. We see travellers that go thus to such great places, return oftentimes infected both in body and soul. So true is that of one, Nunquam inter homines fui, quin minor homo redii.

Obs. 6. Such places as have been eminent for sin, usually are eminent for punishment. As we see in the old world, Sodom, Jerusalem, and Samaria here, for her sin, is made a desolation, Micah i. 6. When sin grows general and national, it brings national judgments, Isa. viii. 18; Jer. xi. 9, 11; Hos. iv. 1—3. When all Israel transgressed the law, no wonder if the curse come upon them, Dan. ix. 11. Many think to escape the better because they have so many companions, when the more general the sin, the nearer to judgment. If all nations sin, all nations must have the cup of God's wrath given them, Jer. xxv. 15; Mal. iii. 8, 9. It is as easy with God to destroy a world of men as one man, they are all but as a drop and a little dust to him, Isa. xl. 15—17. Multitudes of sinners increase wrath. When the Jews "assembled themselves by troops in the harlots' houses," then God would pardon them no longer, Jer. v. 7, 8. The more wicked the times and places are that we live in, the greater our praise will be if we be godly. To be good in good times and places, a hypocrite and formalist may be; but with Lot to be good in Sodom, and Job in the land of Uz, and with Noah in the midst of an ungodly world, and with Elijah to be righteous and zealous in the midst of an unrighteous and perverse generation, that is praiseworthy indeed, and argues much sincerity. It was the commendation of the church of Pergamos, that she professed Christ's name where Satan had his throne, and did not deny him in the days when Antipas, his faithful martyr, was slain, Rev. ii. 12, 13. Fly sin then, which brings destruction, not only on the sinner, but also on the very towns, cities, castles, and places where they dwell. As God has promised that peace and prosperity shall be in the dwellings of the righteous, Job v. 24; viii. 6; Prov. iii. 33, and that he will make a hedge about them, and all that they have, to preserve them from robbery, fire, molestation by evil spirits, and other calamities, Job i. 10; so, on the contrary, sin makes a man naked, and exposes him, and all that he has, to the curse of God. He will destroy the very dwellings of idolaters, swearers, cursers, bribers, &c., Job xii. 6; xv. 34; Zech. v. 4. The wickedness that has been practised in the great houses and castles of this land, has laid many of them in the dust, and we may look to be brought yet lower: we have brought God low in our judgments, low in our affections, low in our actions, low in his ordinances, low in his vicegerents and ambassadors; and therefore it is just with God to lay us low, and to debase us, who have so many ways debased him.

Obs. 7. No fortifications can preserve a sinful people from ruin. Let them make walls as high as heaven, and ditches as deep as hell, yet if sin reign within, it will bring all down. It is not a fleet by sea, nor forces

Quid sit facturus
sine, ut dum ad fingit, ponitur genera pendens inerti, penitentiam agenti, ne inferat que minatur.
Jerome.

Mittamus preces et lacrymas coram legato. Cyprian.

by land, it is not a magazine of treasures, nor an arsenal of armour, that can preserve a wicked kingdom from ruin. As Samaria was a well-fortified, so it was a rebellious, idolatrous, sinful place, and this brought it down, Ezek. xvi. 46; xxiii. 4, 5; Hos. vii. 1; Amos iii. 9, 10; Micah i 5, 7. Though it were strongly fortified both by art and nature, and very large, about three miles in compass, yet Samaria's sin was Samaria's ruin. Nineveh was a populous, ancient, great, strong, wealthy city, yet her great sins laid her in the dust, and made all her strong holds drop like ripe figs, with little ado, into the mouth of the Chaldeans. Babylon a most ancient, ample, wealthy, well-fortified, potent, populous city, yet, abounding with sin, all her power and policy could not keep her from ruin. Jerusalem, that strong city, encompassed with mountains, towers, and bulwarks, fortified both by art and nature, and so powerfully protected by the Lord himself for many years together, to the admiration of all the world, that it was judged invincible; Lam. iv. 12, "The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem;" yet Jerusalem's sin was Jerusalem's ruin; and, therefore, let none confide in cities, or any privileges whatsoever. We are apt in our distresses to run to well-fortified places, but in vain is salvation looked for from those creature confidences; if the Lord help not, how should these help? This is to forsake God, "the fountain of living waters," the Almighty, and all-sufficient, "a very present help in trouble," and to go to cisterns, "broken cisterns" of creature comforts, that will fail and forsake them in a time of trouble, Jer. ii. 13.

Obs. 8. Sin is a bitter thing. Samaria has rebelled, or imbittered (as the word is in the original) God, and "provoked him to anger most bitterly" by her sin, Hos. xii. 14. Ephraim's sins were bitter to God, yea, they were bitternesses, in the abstract, and in the plural number also. This may discover to us the cursed nature of sin, and the iniquity of our iniquities, which turns God's sweetness into bitterness, his patience into wrath, and his bowels into wormwood. If any thing can sadden God, and imbitter his soul, it is sin. To see every base lust preferred before him, to see Satan in the throne, the heart, and the Spirit of God kept out, must needs imbitter his Spirit against us. The Lord that made heaven and earth, and sustains the pillars of it, yet never complains of that burden; but sin is such a burden, that he oft complains of that, as tiring him out, Isa. i. 14, 24; xliii. 24; Amos ii. 13; and the bitterness thereof is as gall, which he cannot endure, Deut. xxxii. 32. God is all love and sweetness, and would not deal thus bitterly with us, did not our bitter sins provoke him to it.

Sin is bitter, 1. To God. 2. To Christ. 3. To the Holy Spirit. 4. To angels: 1. To good angels. 2. To the evil angels. 5. To men: 1. To good men. 2. To wicked men. 6. To states and kingdoms. 7. To the creatures. 8. In its effects: 1. Private. 2. Positive.

Sin is bitter,

1. To God, as we have seen before.

2. To Christ; it made him cry in the bitterness of his soul, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" and made his soul heavy unto death. So bitter were our sins to him that they made him "a man of sorrows," Isa. liii. 3, and made him sweat, non guttas sed granos, clots of blood, Luke xxii. 44. When Christ hung upon the cross, they gave him gall and vinegar to drink: every sin is as gall to him. "The Lord is righteous; for I have rebelled against his commandment," or, as it is in the original, because I have imbittered him; he is righteous in all his judgments on me, for I have imbittered him against me by my bitter sins, Lam. i. 18.

3. To the Holy Spirit of God. Nothing grieves it, and drives it out of the soul, but sin, Gen. vi. 3; Eph. iv. 30.

4. To the angels. 1. To the good angels: it is bitter and displeasing to them to see their Lord and Master daily provoked by a company of sinful, rebellious creatures; and should the Lord give them but a word of command, they would suddenly smite all the wicked dead, and revenge the dishonours done to him, as we see in Sennacherib's blasphemous camp, where one angel in one night killed a hundred fourscore and five thousand men.

2. To the evil angels: it has thrown them from heaven to hell, and of angels it has turned them into devils, and keeps them in chains of darkness to the judgment of the great day, Jude 6.

5. To man. 1. To good men: there is nothing so bitter to them as sin, nothing grieves them like this, that they have grieved the good Spirit of God. All losses, crosses, reproaches, are light with them in comparison of sin. The church of Ephesus could bear any affliction, but not sin, Rev. ii. 2. Good David oft complains of the burden of his sins, seldom of his sufferings, Psal. xxxviii. 4. So bitter a thing is sin to them, that it oftentimes makes them weary of their lives, and long to be dissolved that they may sin no more, Rom. vii. 24; 2 Cor. v. 4; it makes them a burden to themselves, Job vii. 20, and causes them to weep bitterly, Matt. xxvi. 75. Hence Job, chap. xiii. 26, calls sins bitter things, "Thou writest bitter things against me," what is that? "thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth."

2. To wicked men. Though whilst conscience sleeps they may think it a light matter, yet to an enlightened and an awakened conscience nothing is more bitter. This made Adam to hide himself, and Cain to complain that his sin was a burden too heavy for him to bear. Judas could not endure the bitterness of it, but went forth and hanged himself. Nothing so bitter as sin when it is once charged by God upon the conscience; of all heavy things this is the most heavy: "A wounded spirit who can bear?" Those that will not now believe it, yet shall one day find it, that it is an evil and bitter thing that they have sinned against God, Jer. ii. 19; iv. 18; Lam. iii. 15; Amos viii. 10; Prov. ix. 17, 18; xiv. 13; xxiii. 32; Gal. v. 19—21; Acts viii. 23. Solomon, who had found sweetness in the ways of the flesh, yet at last felt and acknowledged the bitterness of such courses, Prov. v. 3, 4; Eccl. vii. 26. Though sin may for a time seem sweet to the sinner, and it be a pastime to them to do wickedly, yet it will be bitterness in the end, the poison of asps is in it, Job xx. 12—14.

If sin then be so bitter, how comes it to pass that wicked men are no more sensible of it? To this I answer,

1. Their consciences are seared with the custom of sinning, which has taken away the sense of sin, so that now it is become connatural and pleasant to them, and so is not grievous. Poison in a toad Elementum in suo loco non est ponderosum. Arist. is not troublesome, he is never sick of it, nor sensible of it, because it is natural to him; but poison in a man, a sheep, a dove, is deadly, because it is not in its proper place.

2. It is a spiritual bitterness; now wicked men have no spiritual life in them, they are dead in sin, and so are insensible of it.

3. The devil, that prince of darkness, keeps wicked men in darkness and ignorance, so that they know not the terrors of the Lord, nor what "a fearful thing" it is to fall into the hands of an angry God; and this makes men so fearless of sin. As we cannot desire what we know not, so we cannot fear it. A child that knows not what a terrible thing a lion or a bear is, will venture to provoke them; but a man of understanding will run from them. It is fools who make a mock of sin, who never knew the danger of it; but the godly, who know its bitterness, will rather choose any misery than the least iniquity, any affliction rather than sin.

6. To states and kingdoms, and provokes the Lord to send bitter enemies against them, Hab. i. 6. The very land where wicked men dwell is sick of them, and cannot have ease till it has spewed them out. As a man that has poison in his stomach is not well till he be rid of it, and as the sea would not be quiet till Jonah was thrown overboard; so nations can have no rest till they have vomited up such wicked men, which, like corrupt humours, oppress and burden them, Lev. xviii. 25, 28; xx. 22. This is that bitter water which causes the curse to seize on persons and nations, Numb. v. 18, and brings upon them bitter destruction, Deut. xxxii. 24. Thus the ten tribes here were spewed out for their idolatry, when they were carried captive by Shalmaneser into the land of the Medes, from whence they never returned, 2 Kings xvii. 18. And the Jews were vomited up when they were carried captive into Babylon for the space of seventy years, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21.

7. To the creatures. They all groan under the burden, and as a woman in travail longs to be disburdened and eased of her birth, so the whole creation travails in pain, and longs to be delivered from that bondage, vanity, and corruption, to which it is subject by reason of the sin of man, Rom. viii. 20—22.

8. In its effects, which are twofold: 1. Privative. 2. Positive.

1. The privative effects of sin are sevenfold: it deprives us of,

1. The favour of God, which is the very life of souls: "In his favour is life," Psal. xxx. 5.

2. God's fatherly care and protection over us, Gen. iv. 14; Exod. xxxii. 25.

3. The guard of the angels. Every godly man has not one angel, but a guard of angels about him, to keep him, whilst he keeps God's ways, Psal. xxxiv. 7; xci. 11, 12; Heb. i. 14.

4. Peace of conscience; a jewel of more worth than all the world. Adam, when he had sinned, was afraid, and hid himself. David, after his sin, complained of broken bones, his sight and sense of sin was as bitter to him as if he had broken all his bones, Psal. li. 8.

5. Our excellency. Purity is our excellency; it is sin, and only sin, that robs us of our glory, and makes us like other men. As Jacob said of Reuben when he had defiled his father's bed, "Thou shalt not excel," Gen. xlix. 4.

6. All true right to the creature. A wicked man is a usurper, though he may have a civil right, in foro soli, yet, in foro poli, he has a sanctified right to nothing. When men are in Christ, then, and not till then, all is theirs, 1 Cor. iii. 22.

7. Heaven and eternal happiness, Rev. xxi. 27.

2. The positive effects of sin are more especially three. It exposes us to all miseries, external, internal, and eternal.

Sin exposes us to miseries,

1. External, in body, goods, good name; we may thank sin for all our sicknesses, sorrows, sores, losses, plagues, poverty, &c., Deut. xxviii. 15—68; Lam. iii. 39.

2. Internal. It brings hardness of heart, the sorest of plagues; all the plagues of Pharaoh, all the sores of Job, and all the sorrows of Joseph, are nothing compared with it. This brings spiritual blindness, a reprobate sense, a spirit of slumber, and strong delusions, Isa. vi. 9, 10; Rom. xi. 8.

3. Eternal miseries both in soul and body; it brings sorrows endless, caseless, and remediless. So that there is no evil like the evil of sin, no plague like this plague. As piety has the promise, and carries its reward with it, and though no man should recompense it, yet the good we do is recompence itself; not only for, but in, the very keeping of God's commandments there is great reward, Psal. xix. 11; the act of keeping them is a reward as well as the issue. As every good work brings its reward with it, so every evil work brings its sorrow with it; and though no man punish it, yet it is a punishment to itself, it is finis operis, though not finis operantis; Jer. iv. 18, "Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee." Sin is that which procures us all our sorrow, we should therefore hate it with a pure and perfect hatred, and get this cause of all our sorrows removed, and then the effect will cease.

Now is sin so bitter? 1. Then take heed of pleading for sin, or extenuating it. Put not sweet names upon so bitter a thing. There is a woe denounced against such as do so, Isa. v. 20, "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter!" Such look upon sin through the devil's spectacles, and then no wonder if they call drunkenness good fellowship, covetousness frugality, pride decency, &c. Such put a fair glove upon a foul hand, and false glosses upon filthy vices, the better to deceive. "But let no man deceive you with vain words, for even for these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience." Call not therefore sin so as the corrupt world calls it, but esteem and call it as the word of God calls it. How is that? Why, it calls it an abomination, poison, sorrow, sickness, bitterness, filth, vomit, folly, madness, darkness, dung, death, &c.

When the judgment is thus truly convinced of the violence of sin, it is an excellent preservation against sin.

2. If sin be so bitter, then sad is the condition of such as are insensible of its bitterness, who make that their recreation here which will be their damnation hereafter, who plead not only for infirmities (which yet no good man dares do) but also for enormities. They declare their sin like Sodom, impudently and impenitently; they thank God they never knew what the burden or bitterness of sin meant; but know, if sin be not bitter here, it will in another world be more than bitter.

And therefore this may comfort those that groan and groive under the burden and bitterness of sin; such as make their sin their greatest sorrow, Christ will be unto them their greatest joy. Christ calls such, as it were by name, to come to him, Isa. lv. 1, 2; Matt. xi. 28. This qualifies a man, and fits him for Christ; when Christ sees of the travail of his soul in our souls, it delights him, Isa. liii. 10, 11. This sense of sin argues some spiritual life in the soul. Nature will not complain of nature, nor will corruption complain of corruption; it is only grace that makes us truly sensible of the bitterness of sin.

3. Pity those that groan under the burden and bitterness of sin. No sorrow like their sorrow, no burden like the burden of a wounded conscience. Add not affliction to the afflictions of those whom God has wounded, but pour the oil of mercy into their sin-sick souls. Be not like Job's friends, miserable comforters, and physicians of no value; if we must ease our enemy's ox or ass when he lies under his burden, shall we not much more ease our brother's soul? Exod. xxiii. 5. Be not harsh or hasty, be not sour and censorious, to such, but be meek and merciful, and so bear each other's burdens, Gal. vi. 1, 2.

Obs. 9. It is a sad aggravation of people's sins when they sin against their God. The God of all their mercies, the fountain of all their enjoyments; their God in covenant, whom they have avouched for their God, and vowed openly that he shall be their God, and they

Deus illorum esse dicitur, ut qui fœderis necti conjunctus sit illis, quem jure societatis colere debeant, a quo non

*poterat citra perfidie crimine deli-cere. Wolf in
2 Reg. xvii.*

would be his people, to love, serve, fear, and obey him; yet, contrary to all vows, baptistical, eucharistical, personal, national, to fly from God, and to rebel against him, this is the height of sin, and makes it exceeding sinful, and provokes the Lord to say, "Lo-ammi, Yc are not my people," as he said to Ephraim, Hos. i. 9.

And is not this England's sin? God has taken us into covenant with himself, he has owned us above all the people in the world, he has made us the head and terror of the nations, he has done wonders for us at home and abroad, and made us his darling nation; whilst others swim in blood, we swim in blessings of peace; whilst others are weeping and wailing by the waters of Babylon, we dwell in an Eden, joy and gladness are found in us, thanksgiving and the voice of melody. He has made us his Ephraim, he has laid his right hand upon us, he has planted us in a fruitful soil, hedged us about with his gracious protection and good laws; he has removed from amongst us all the apparent impediments to our growth and fruitfulness; he has furnished us with choice persons, and those persons with excellent gifts and graces; he has a special care over us for good; and now he looks (as well he may) for the pleasant grapes of obedience, but behold the sour and wild grapes of confusion, disorder, error, and disobedience abound amongst us. We have broken all our covenants, we are not only sermon-proof, but we are also covenant-proof; no bonds so sacred, so strong, but we can as easily break them as Samson did the cords of the Philistines. So that what can we expect but that the Lord should take away his hedge of government both temporal and spiritual, breaking down the wall which defended us from our enemies, and letting in all the wild beasts that might destroy us? Justly might he withdraw his good hand of providence and protection from us, and expose us to all manner of rapine and ruin, for our apostacies and rebellions.

Hall on 2 Tim. iii. 3.

Obs. 10. Sin, especially the sin of rebellion, brings the sword upon a people. "They shall fall by the sword." This is God's last and great rod, and he never brings it forth till he be greatly provoked by his people's sins, Job xxxvi. 12; Isa. i. 20. When no other means will better a people, then comes the sword and cuts them off. God has three evil arrows, which he shoots at a rebellious people, viz. the sword, famine, and pestilence, Ezek. v. 16, 17; these are called "arrows," because they are sharp and deadly; and "evil," because of the misery and mischief which they bring: of all the three, the sword is the sorest, as appears by David's choice, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14; besides, the plague and famine are the usual attendants of war; where the sword goes before, there famine and pestilence usually attend.

Obs. 11. Little infants are great sinners. "Their infants shall be dashed in pieces."
1. That great sin and rebellion of Adam is imputed to them for sin; what he did, they did, we were all in the loins of that one man, Rom. v. 12.
2. They have not only original sin imputed, but imparted also; they have inherent original sin, which is radically, seminally, fundamentally all sin. The youngest child carries an old man of sin within him. We are no sooner born into the world, but we have a world of sin about us.
3. The sad diseases, pangs, and dismal deaths which seize on infants, are strong proofs of this point, their very dying speaks them sinners. "The wages of sin," be it original or actual, "is death," Rom. vi. 23. Original sin, which is the greatest sin in the world, cleaves to their natures, and makes them odious and abominable in God's sight, so that they are by nature children of wrath, and obnoxious to all his judgments. We are all dammati antequam nati, and so might justly have been sent from the womb to the tomb.

Obs. 12. Wicked parents bring judgments on their posterity. Their poor little ones fare the worse for them; Hos. ix. 12, 13, "Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them," and "Ephraim shall bring forth children to the murderer," who is God's executioner; so become parricides, rather than parents. Thus the old world was drowned, and their children with them; and the Sodomites were burnt, and their children with them. Achan was not only stoned himself, but his sons and daughters, yea, and his cattle, perished with him. The accusers of Daniel were slain by the lions, both they and their children, Dan. vi. 24. The Jews that rejected and crucified Christ, brought a curse not only upon themselves, but also upon their children, Matt. xxvii. 25, "His blood be on us, and on our children," which has now lain on them above sixteen hundred years.

It is just with God to cut off the wicked and their seed, as we kill the wolf with her whelps, and the fox with her cubs: though the young whelp has not actually poisoned any, yet, because it has a poisonous nature in it, we destroy it. So does God by the children of the wicked, Gen. xix. 25; Numb. xvi. 32, 33; 1 Sam. xv. 3; Isa. xiii. 16; Jer. xlv. 7; Hos. x. 14. When men rebel against God and reject his ways, he will send against them a barbarous and cruel nation, that shall not regard the persons of the old, nor have compassion on the young, Deut. xxviii. 50; xxxii. 25; Ezek. ix. 6.

But are not infants called "innocents," Psal. cvi. 38; Jer. xix. 4? how then can it consist with the justice of God thus severely to punish them?

True, they are so called, but not because they have no sin; but, 1. In respect of those cruel men, who without any cause shed the blood of those little ones who had deserved no such thing at their hands. So the Assyrians here were guilty of great inhumanity, in killing those infants, and God in his due time retaliated it on them, Nah. iii. 10.

2. Though they may be called innocent in respect of any actual sin, yet they are not so in respect of original sin, which seminally and radically is every sin. The guilt of that sin cleaves to their natures, and makes them obnoxious to all tortures here, and eternal torments hereafter.

3. The sins of the parents may be also a moving cause, and may provoke the Lord to smite the parents with their children. Exod. xx. 5, the Lord threatens to visit the sins of idolatrous parents upon their children, because either they already walk in their fathers' sins, or else in time they would do so, or, it may be, worse, which God only knows.

3. God has a sovereign right and power over all his creatures; he is the potter, and we are his clay, he may do with his own what he pleases, he may make us or mar us, raise us or ruin us; and none may say unto him, What doest thou? He that gives life may take it away, how and when he pleases; his will is the rule of justice, yea, justice itself; we must therefore adore God's judgments when we cannot comprehend them, and know that, though they may be secret, yet they are always just.

4. Children are parts of their parents, part of their family and part of their substance, and God may justly punish the sinful parent in his child, as well as in his cattle and estate, because they do not only belong to him, but also are a part of him.

5. Sin committed by a particular member of a politic body is by a synecdoche, frequent in Scripture, attributed to the whole body, and does, in a measure, really belong to it. Thus Achan's sin, though not known to the people, yet made them all guilty, till he was put to death, Josh. vii. 11.

Id. Lavater in Josh.

6. Yet these temporal judgments may be mingled with spiritual mercies; as we see in Jeroboam's child, who was taken away in merey, because there was some goodness found in him, 1 Kings xiv. 12, 13. Especially

*Infantes sunt pars melis et; oportet eos cum reclesia affili, ut rediantur conformes filio Dei.
Luther.*

the infants of God's people, that are in covenant with their parents, there is great grounds of hope that they have changed their temporal life for an eternal; and are freed from many sins, sorrows, and temptations, to which men that live to riper years are exposed; yea, if they should be cast away for their original sin, yet their damnation will be lighter than if they had lived longer. It had been good for reprobates if they had not been born, or that they had died as soon as they had been born, for then they would not have had so many sins to answer for.

But has not God said, "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father?" Deut. xxiv. 16; 2 Kings xiv. 6; Ezek. xviii. 20. It seems then to be cruelty to kill the children for the parents' sins, especially such as are unborn, and have not deserved such evils. To which I would answer,

1. It is true in respect of the Assyrians, it was cruelty and horrid barbarousness in them to kill poor harmless little ones, and God threatens to visit such sins upon the heads of such sinners.

2. It is not cruelty in God, for children are children of wrath as well as their parents; as all have sinned, so he may punish all without injustice. Besides, he permits and orders the cruelty of wicked adversaries to his own glory and his people's good. As for Deut. xxiv. 16, it speaks of God's restraining of magistrates, who may not punish the children for the fathers' offences. True it is, God finds cause enough in children themselves to punish them, but when they imitate their wicked parents, this hastens and heightens wrath, by adding sin to sin.

3. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, if he depart from the father's iniquity and do not walk in his steps. Ezek. xviii. 14, 17, "If he beget a son, that seeth all his father's sins which he hath done, and considereth, and doeth not such like," "he shall not die for the iniquity of his father." But if the son tread in his father's steps, he shall bear his own iniquity, and becomes accessory to his father's sin, by imitation, and approbation of it, Matt. xxiii. 32; Luke xi. 48, 50; and the blood of former generations had not been required of that generation if they had not been as bloody as the former. But where old sins are continued and approved of by new acting of them, there the old sins, as well as the new, are justly punished. So that the threatening is not to be understood absolutely, but conditionally, viz. if the children do persist in their fathers' sins and walk in their wicked ways.

4. The son shall not bear the personal iniquities of the father in reference to eternal punishment; God will not damn a son simply for the sin of his father, it is a man's own sin which is his everlasting ruin, yet he may lay many temporal chastisements upon a good son for the sin of his father. The Lord, in Ezek. xviii. 20, 23, 32, seems to speak of eternal, and not of temporal punishment.

1. This should make parents fearful of displeasing God, lest they bring miseries, not only on themselves, but also on their children; their idolatry may bring a curse upon their children's children to many generations. No children in Scripture are threatened like the children of idolaters. In none of the commandments does God threaten to visit the sin of the fathers upon the children but only in the second, Exod. xx. 5. It is well observed by a pious and precious divine, that there are eight sins which do more especially bring judgments on a man's posterity; whereof the first is idolatry.

2. Adultery, 2 Sam. xii. 14.

3. Covenant-breaking, 2 Sam. xxi. 13.

4. Persecution of the godly, Matt. xxiii. 31—36; Psal. cxxxvii. 7.

5. Murder, 1 Kings xxi. 21; Jer. xv. 4.

6. Oppression, Job xx. 19—26; Hab. ii. 9.

7. Contempt of magistracy and ministry, Numb. xvi. 32, 41, 49; 1 Kings xiii. 33, 34.

8. When men pretend reformation, and intend themselves, as Jehu did, Hos. i. 4.

God is very pitiful and tender over infants, as appears in that he would not destroy Nineveh for the infants' sakes that were in it, Jonah iv. 11; and in the sacking of cities he commands them to spare infants, Deut. xx. 14; but it is the sin of parents which many times hardens God's heart against them, and makes him to delight in the destruction both of them and theirs; yea, and it hardens men's hearts against them so that they cannot but act such cruelty against them, as they never intended, as we see of Hazael, 2 Kings viii. 11—13. When the prophet Elisha wept, and told him what mischief he should do to Israel; "Their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child;" "Hazael said, But what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" He then thought it a base and barbarous thing, when he was king Ben-hadad's servant, to act such inhuman cruelty upon the mothers with their infants. The prophet only tells him that he shall be a king, ver. 13, and then when he had changed his condition he would also change his manners, and commit all the abominations which he mentioned. Let parents then labour for grace, that they may leave a blessing, and not a curse, to their posterity, Gen. xvii. 7; Exod. xx. 6; Psal. cxii. 2. If you will not pity yourselves, yet pity your little ones, let not them fare the worse for you. It is ill being a wicked man's child, yea, their very beasts fare the worse for them; Achan was stoned, and his cattle with him, Josh. vii. 24, 25. The wicked Egyptians bring a murrain upon their cattle, Exod. ix. 3. As a good man is a public good, the family, city, kingdom, fare the better for him, yea, his cattle are spared for his sake; "The Lord shall sever between the cattle of Israel and the cattle of Egypt: and there shall nothing die of all that is the children's of Israel," Exod. ix. 4. God blesses the very cattle of his people, and if the creature could speak it would desire to serve those that serve God. Most parents provide inheritances for their children, but oftentimes they leave their sins with them too. It was a sad legacy that Joab left to his children, that one should be a leper, another a weakling, a third beg his bread, 2 Sam. iii. 29. So many a man, to one child he leaves his murder, to another his adultery, to a third his usury, to a fourth his swearing. Gehazi left a talent of silver behind him to his posterity, but he left the leprosy with it. Better wunt such men's lands and inheritances, than thus to inherit their sins too.

2. Let children be humbled then for their forefathers' sins, that they be not imputed to them, Lev. xxvi. 41. So did Nehemiah, chap. i. 6; and David, Psal. lxxix. 8, "O remember not against us former iniquities;" עֲוֹנוֹת אֲבוֹתֵינוּ the iniquities of our forefathers. He that sees the sins of his predecessors, and is not humbled for them, approves of them, and so becomes accessory to them. Hence the Lord blames Belshazzar for not humbling himself for his father's sin and punishment which he knew of, Dan. v. 22. Let us therefore acknowledge ourselves to be the children of sinful parents, and say before God, "A Syrian ready to perish was my father," Deut. xxvi. 5; and, with David, "We have sinned with our fathers," Psal. cvi. 6; and, with Daniel, chap. ix. 8, deprecate the punishment which is due to us for their sins. So Jer. xiv. 20.

3. Admire the patience of the Lord, that has borne so long with us who have been sinners from the womb. If little ones, who never sinned against the patience of God as we have done, endure such pangs, sorrows, sickness, and death, what may men of years look for, who have added to original corruption a numberless number of actual transgressions? If this be done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry? If infants (who are innocents, and righteous comparatively) shall scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and rebellious sinner appear? If he spare not little ones that lie in their mothers' bowels, but suffer wicked men to drag them thence; where, oh where shall those wicked parents appear, who have been the primary cause of all this mischief and sorrow to them, and have been the authors and actors of that wickedness which has brought this misery on them? It should therefore be matter of great humiliation to us all, when we see the sharp and sore judgments that oft light upon little ones for their original sin.

As God's people were wont in extraordinary cases to bring their infants and sucklings with them to keep fasts, Joel ii. 16, the better to affect their hearts, and break them with sorrow for sin, which threatened destruction to them and their little ones; even this use should we make of the miseries of infants; when we see God's hand upon them, we should humble ourselves to think what judgments are due to us who have so many actual sins to answer for, which these little ones are free from. We should therefore mourn over them as David did for the people, As for these sheep, what have they done? it is I that have sinned. So let us say, As for these little ones, what have they done? it is we, even we that have sinned, and provoked the Lord to anger with our transgressions.

Obs. 12. Rebellion brings destruction. Samaria shall be made desolate, for she has rebelled. When God's heritage is as a lion that roars and rages against him, then he gives it into the hands of its enemies, Jer. xii. 7—11; iv. 17; xlv. 16, 17, 22; Lam. i. 18, 20; Micah vi. 13; Matt. xxiii. 38. Israel had sinned, and now the Assyrian destroys their cities, eats up their fruits, passes through their land, carries the people into captivity, and makes slaves and exiles of them in a strange country.

1. Rebellion is a capital sin; it is not every sin, (though every sin, more or less, has something of rebellion in it, being committed against that allegiance which we owe to God by the law of creation,) but it is an habitual obstinacy and stubbornness in sin; hence such are said to have necks of iron, and brows of brass, hard and uncircumcised hearts; they are called a froward generation, "lying children, children that will not hear the law of the Lord," Isa. xxx. 9; rebelling against the light, Job xxiv. 13.

It is reckoned amongst the greatest sins, and is compared to witchcraft, 1 Sam. xv. 23, which is the highest and most hideous idolatry in the world; it is a renouncing of God to follow the counsel of the devil. It is a sin that God will certainly visit, for his justice will not suffer it to go unpunished, Exod. xxxiv. 7; Isa. i. 2, 7.

For sins of mere infirmity there is a pardon in course; but sins of presumption, committed with a high hand against light and warning, are very dangerous, and therefore David prays of all sins to be kept from such, Psal. xix. 13. Those great sins call for great humiliation, before there can be any pardon expected, Exod. xxxiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 12; Psal. lxxviii. 18.

2. Do not envy the prosperous condition of rebel-lous sinners; though they may flourish for a time, and waters of a full cup be wrung out unto them, yet their feet shall slide in due time, and every threatening shall light upon them. They are rather to be pitied than envied.

3. As ever we desire to be free from desolation, let us fly those sins which cause it. Look what sins brought desolation upon Ephraim, those sins will bring desolation on England, if they reign amongst us; for God is the same to the same sinners.

Quest. But what were Ephraim's sins which brought desolation upon him?

Ans. Upon search I find them to be many, but about twenty signal ones there are which brought destruction on him. Whether they be not England's sins, as well as Ephraim's, the application will show.

Ephraim's sins then were, 1. Idolatry. 2. A ready complying with men's inventions. 3. Contempt of the true prophets. 4. Delight in false prophets. 5. Pride. 6. Hypocrisy. 7. Self-seeking. 8. Witchcraft. 9. Barrenness under the means of grace. 10. Ingratitude. 11. Covenant-breaking. 12. Security. 13. Anarchy. 14. Lukewarmness and neutrality. 15. Division. 16. Carnal confidence. 17. Incurribleness. 18. Oppression. 19. Atheism. 20. A fulness of sin. Lastly, Corrupt rulers.

1. Their first grand, bosom, beloved sin was idolatry. They forsook the Lord, and set up calves; when they should have cried, Kiss ye the Son and worship him, they cry, Kiss ye the calves, which Jeroboam has set up, and worship them, Hos. xiii. 1, 2; and this idolatry was universal, it was not in one, but in all their cities, 2 Kings xvii. 9—11; Ezek. xxiii. 4, 5.

This is a God-provoking and a land-destroying sin, it is the choosing (as it were) another husband, it breaks the covenant and the marriage knot between God and a people. It is a preferring of the devil before Christ, and dirty dunghill gods גלילים before the living God, 2 Kings xvii. 12; Ezek. iv. 12; xiv. 10.

Whatever sinners may escape, yet idolaters are sure to pay for it. When men begin to choose new gods, the next news is, War is in the gates, Judg. v. 8; Psal. lxxviii. 58; Jer. xxii. 7—9; Micah i. 5—7. Many sorrows attend this sin, Psal. xvi. 4. This, even this, was that fatal sin which laid Samaria in the dust, Amos viii. 14; and therefore Hosea more inveighs against their idolatry, than against any other sin.

And is not this England's sin? Have not we chosen of late many new gods, and with Ephraim set up "idols according to our own understanding?" Hos. xiii. 2; and have made a light within us, and not God's word, the rule of our actions? We have forsaken his faithful ministers to follow calves, Socinian, Arian, Arminian, Anabaptist, Quaking calves. Moses bare with many provocations from the people of Israel, but when, in his absence, they set up a calf, he could bear no longer. Where can we go, but we meet with Jeroboam's calves? what town, city, county, is not pestered with them? These prophesy falsely, and too many love to have it so; but what will they do in the end thereof, when God shall call them to account for all their heresies and blasphemies? Jer. v. 31.

Besides the gross idolatry that still abounds in the land, many are falling openly to popery, and many, in their affections, banking after the bewitching allurements of that Babylonish harlot. A sad omen of an approaching judgment, as France and Germany can testify.

And add to this the great worldly-mindedness and inordinate love of the world that abounds amongst us, which is idolatry in God's esteem, Col. iii. 5.

2. A second sin of Ephraim was a ready compliance with the inventions of men, Hos. v. 11; xi. 6; "Ephraim

Quorum exitus perhorrescit, eorum opera pestiferas.

is oppressed and broken in judgment, because he willingly walked after the commandment" and traditions of men, preferring them before God's commandments. Jeroboam no sooner commanded idolatry, than the people obeyed, 1 Kings xii. 32, 33. Omri, another of their kings, makes statutes for grosser idolatry, and even in those statutes did they walk, Micah vi. 16. And for this the Lord threatens to destroy them, Hos. v. 12, 14.

And is not this England's sin? Are not many, too many amongst us, more ready to hearken to a seducer than to a faithful teacher, and more ready to follow vanity than verity, preferring the chaff of men's inventions before the wheat of God's word? Let the ablest minister in the land preach in some towns, yet how many are there that prefer a railing, seducing secretary, who preaches the fancies and dotages of his own brain, before the faithful servants of God, that dispense his word sincerely!

This also is a sad presage of some approaching judgment.

3. Contempt of the true prophets. It was a rare age of prophets, they had the best preaching a little before their ruin. So great was the Lord's care over them, and so loth was he that they should perish, that he sent extraordinary prophets to them, more in number than he did to the kingdom of Judah, and by them he supplied the defect of the ordinary ministry of priests and Levites. They had Elijah, Elisha, Jonah, Amos, Micah, Joel, and Hosea, who prophesied to them about seven and forty years, besides Ahijah, Jehu, Iddo, Azariah, &c.; yet such was their obstinacy and perverseness, that no woodings nor warnings could work upon them; instead of hearkening to those messengers which the Lord in great compassion sent to them to reclaim them from their idols, they mocked, jeered, misused, and persecuted them, and looked upon them as a pack of cheats and deceivers that frightened people without a cause, till the wrath of the Lord broke forth against them, and there was no remedy; his anger was so fierce it could not be extinguished. When David sent messengers to comfort Hanan, and he abused them, David's anger was kindled against him, and it cost him dear, 2 Sam. x. 4. Contempt of the word is an infallible forerunner of judgment.

When Eli's sons hearkened not to the counsel of their father, God cut them off. When Amaziah contemned the counsel of the prophet, it was a sign that the Lord purposed to destroy him, 2 Chron. xxv. 16.

And if this be an infallible sign of a nation's ruin, the Lord be merciful to England! never was the land so full of pious, painful, learned ministers, and never were any so coarsely and ungratefully dealt withal by many, as these are. What loads of reproaches and floods of bitter railings are cast out against us, not for any evil that we have done, but solely for discharging our duty, and stopping men in their sinful, heretical, destructive ways! we are their enemies only because we tell them the truth. Those that formerly were ready to pull out their own eyes to do us good, now are ready to pull out our eyes. Thus have we been wounded in the house of our friends. To be derided by Egyptians is threatened as a misery, Hos. vii. 16; but to be reproached by friends and professors is very grievous. The good Lord lay not this ingratitude and contempt to their charge. Though we bear, yet God will not always bear. When Moses is silent, then God arises; when he is dumb, then God speaks; when he is deaf, then God hears and stirs, Numb. xii. 1, 4. God will smite through the loins of those that rise against his messengers, and of those that hate them, that they rise not up again, Deut. xxxiii. 11.

It is not so much the minister as the ministry that is cried down; that which they should principally love us for, viz. for our work's sake, that is the ground of these men's hatred. As it was not the baron, but the barony, that was the traitor in tyrants' days; so, for the most part, it is not so much the man that they smite at, as the maintenance, the tithes, the glebe, and the ordinances of God wherewith they are intrusted.

4. Delight in false prophets. Elijah is persecuted, when eight hundred and fifty false prophets are entertained and fed, 1 Kings xviii. 4, 19; though they were fools and mad-men: Hos. ix. 7, "The days of visitation are come;" how doth that appear? why, "the prophet," the false prophet, "is a fool," and flatters the people with vain hopes; yea, "the spiritual man is mad;" that is, he who brags so much of the Spirit, and falsely boasts that he is inspired by the Holy Spirit, and that he speaks all as moved by it, this man is mad, he is smitten with a spiritual frenzy, doting upon his own dreams, and lunatic illuminations, and venting his brainsick notions instead of God's word. These priests Jeroboam (in his carnal policy) chose out of "the lowest of the people," (fit servants for such gods, calves suit well with calves,) which were not of the sons of Levi, who were set apart by God's special command for the service of his house, but "whosoever would" might thrust himself into the office, how unworthy soever, 1 Kings xiii. 33; but see what follows immediately, ver. 34, "This thing became sin unto the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off, and to destroy it from off the face of the earth." This, even this, was that indelible sin which ruined both him and his family.

And is not this the sin of England? are not false prophets by many thousands preferred before the true? will not many go ten miles to hear a deceiver, that will not go two to hear a faithful minister of Christ? When men go by troops to such harlotry meetings, the Lord will visit for this, as well as for corporal harlotry, Jer. v. 7, 9.

The Quaking seducers are certainly led by this spirit of the devil, as will easily appear, if we consider the men, the matter, or the manner of their speaking.

1. The men, both speakers and hearers, are generally a profane generation, they are mordaces et mendaces, notorious railers and liars, like their father the devil.

2. The matter of their speaking. What is it? why, it is against ministers and their maintenance, against the coercive power of the magistrate, against Scripture, ordinances, &c.

3. The manner of their meeting. It is profane and tumultuous. A rout meet together, on a mountain, a common, or under some hedge, and there, without any praying before, some speak, others jeer, some dispute, some quarrel and fight, others take tobacco, (amidst such an unsavoury company they had need of some better antidote,) so that one would think they were at some bear-baiting, and not at the service of God. That men should be tolerated, yea and encouraged, to serve God, is commendable; but that men should be tolerated to blaspheme and worship the devil, is abominable.

2. What folly and madness have seized on the false prophets of our times, the swarms of blasphemous pamphlets do sufficiently testify to the world; the thousands and ten thousands infected by them plainly foretell that some judgment is at hand.

3. How many of Jeroboam's priests have thrust themselves into the work of the ministry, who vent heresies and blasphemies instead of truth! What toleration and countenance have been given to such, is known now to all the world. Foreign churches complain against us for it; and what cause we have to fear that wrath is coming upon us for this sin, let the wise reader judge. If ever that caution of our Saviour were in season, it is now, Matt. x. 17, "Beware of men."

Christ does not say, Beware of serpents, or devils, (he promised them power over these, Mark xvi. 17, 18,) but, "Beware of men."

1. Beware of wicked men, wolfish persecutors and bloodsuckers, who hate us "without a cause," Psal. lxxix. 4: how much more, when by our unwise walking we shall expose ourselves to their fury and malice!

2. Beware of hypocrites, and seeming good men. The devil can transform himself into an angel of light, and oft appears in Samuel's mantle, the better to deceive; he is never more to be feared. It is this sanctus Satanas, this white devil, that does us most hurt: the swearing, cursing, black devil, every one cries shame of; but it is the preaching, praying, professing devil, who pretends to extraordinary sanctity and mortification, that deceives even many a good soul in its over-much credulity. These are more dangerous (in some sense) to us, than the very devil himself; for if the devil should appear to us in his own native deformity, we should run from him for fear, no man would hearken to him: if the devil should come in person, and call men to the alehouse, or from their callings, who would obey? but when he comes to us in a friend, a wife, a bosom companion, he is not so easily perceived, and so we are sooner ensnared; and therefore our Saviour saith not, Beware of Satan, but, Beware of those men who are the instruments of Satan: if they should come like angels, we should suspect them, if like beasts, we should shun them, if like fiends, we should fear them; but coming to us like men of the same profession with us, and professing great kindness to us, how soon are poor plain souls deceived! and therefore "beware of men," for as God loves to work upon men by the ministry of man, and sends them to such; so the devil, who is God's ape, loves to draw men from God, by men, viz. by seducers and deceivers, who are inspired, fitted, and filled by him for that purpose. If Ahab will not hear Micaiah, the true prophet of the Lord, the devil has four hundred false prophets at hand to deceive him. When he would seduce Adam from his obedience, he does not appear himself, but he sets Eve his wife upon him, and so prevails. When he would have innocent Abel slain, he does not do it himself, but he has a malicious Cain that will do it. When the devil would have Christ crucified, he has a Judas, a devil incarnate, ready at hand to betray him, John xiii. 2.

3. Beware even of good men. The devil can shroud himself under a Peter, and tempt our Saviour by him, Matt. xvi. 23; by his example he can compel the Gentiles to live after the Jewish manner, in observing the ceremonial law, Gal. ii. 14. The best of men are but men at best; they know but in part, they have their infirmities, and must have their grains of allowance; we may not therefore glory in men, nor pin our faith on their sleeves, because we know not whither they may carry it. The great sin of this age is, building on man; Such a holy man is for a toleration, and such a one holds such opinions. What tell you me of men? we must live by rule, not by example, neither may we follow any good man further than he follows Christ in his word, 1 Cor. xi. 1. Be it Paul, you must try his doctrine by the touch-stone of the word, before you trust it, Acts xvii. 11. Remember "every man" is "a liar," Rom. iii. 4, either actively, or passively; either by imposture, and of purpose, or else by impotency, and in event.

4. Beware of great men. We are apt to be led by their examples; if Prince such a one, or Sir Thomas such a one, rise, how apt are people to follow, without any consideration! Great men oft are great sinners, they have their native corruptions heightened by their pomp and prosperity, Job xxi. 7—15; Jer. v. 5. When great men are wicked men, and have great parts and great wits, they do great mischief, as Ahithophel, Catliline, &c. Beware then of following such great ones.

5. Beware of subtle seducers, pretenders to new light, Gen. iii. 5, to revelations, glorious mysteries, &c., Rom. xvi. 17; "inwardly they are ravening wolves," Matt. vii. 15. Poison in itself is dangerous, but never more dangerous than when mixed with honey. These have "men's persons in admiration," but it is for their own ends and advantage, Jude 16. And if ever this caution were seasonable, it is now, when there are so many jugglers and cheaters gone forth into the world. Their number is greater than formerly, and they act more subtly and mystically; they act against Christ under the name of Christ, Matt. xxiv. 5, and that so cunningly and craftily, that, if it were possible, they would deceive the very elect, Matt. xxiv. 24; they have Jacob's voice, but Esau's hands; they talk divinely, as if they had no bodies, and live lewdly, as if they had no souls; hence it is that we are so oft admonished to take heed of them, Rom. xvi. 17; 2 Tim. iii. 5; 2 John 10.

But such cite Scripture. So did the devil, Matt. iv. 6.

But there is some truth in what they say. So there is in the mass, and in stage plays. It is the devil's usual practice, to mix some sugar with his poison to make it go down the better, and to mingle some truths with his errors; as the fowler mingles corn with his chaff, that he may catch the sooner. You will shun those that poison your bodies, O take heed of those that would poison your souls. No murder like soul-murder. Shun a seducer, as you would shun the devil himself, whose factor he is; and when he speaks fairest, and pretends most love, then fear him most. When Herod intended Christ's destruction, he then pretended devotion, Matt. ii. 8. When Absalom sought his father's kingdom, he pretends a vow at Hebron. When Saul would ruin David, he makes him his son-in-law, 1 Sam. xviii. 17. Beware then of men, who put fair gloves upon foul hands; who pretend pity, but act cruelty; who promise liberty when they intend thralldom.

But they are great professors. So were those that followed Christ, yet he would not trust them, for he knew the deceit that was in them, John ii. 24, 25. All is not gold that glitters, nor are all Israel that are of Israel; and therefore take heed whom you trust.

6. Beware of thy foes. We are beset round with them, and that both corporal and spiritual; we had need therefore to be sober, and watch, and to pray with David, Help me, O Lord, and that "because of mine enemies," Psal. xxvii. 11. Many there be that watch for our halting, we also should watch and countermine them. There is a cursed enmity in the wicked against the righteous, Gen. iii. 15; Psal. xxxvii. 14; so that they could even slay them all, as Cain did Abel, 1 John iii. 12, because by their light and life they reprove them. And this enmity is,

1. Natural, and so constant and delightful.

2. Intensive. As a good man loves good men, appreciative et intensive, affectu et effectu, with a high degree of affection, and shows it in his actions; so the wicked hate the godly with an inveterate, intensive hatred, they could even wish that they had more lives than one, that they might exercise their malice on them; antipathy is against the whole kind, they desire that even the name of Israel might be no more in remembrance.

3. Irreconcilable. Enemies may be reconciled, but enmities never, till nature be changed: when Saul is converted, and become a Paul, then, and not till then, he prizes whom before he persecuted.

4. Beware of thy friends and relations. By these the devil oftentimes does us more hurt than by our open enemies; and therefore when one was praying, Lord, deliver me from my foes; Nay, said one that heard him, rather pray, Lord, deliver me from my friends. We usually shun our foes, and take heed of their counsel; but it is the devil in a friend that undoes us. The Italian proverb is, God keep me from the hurt of my friends, and I will see to my foes.

But it is my wife that persuades me, and shall I not hearken to her? If thy wife give thee good counsel according to the word, then, in all that Sarah shall say unto thee, hearken to her voice; else you must stop your ears against those sirens. How many wives have deluded their husbands, and drawn their hearts from God! Adam, by hearkening to Eve, undid himself and all his posterity. Solomon was besotted by his idolatrous wives, Samson betrayed by Delilah, and Job had undone himself had he hearkened to his wife's wicked counsel, Job ii. 9.

But it is my son, my brother, my kinsman, that counsels me. Even these may deceive you, if you take not heed; "A man's foes shall be they of his own household." What the Scripture speaks in case of persecution, is most true in case of temptation; brother shall betray brother, the father the child, and children shall rise against the father, Matt. x. 21, 36. Even Christ's brethren rose against him, John vii. 5; and the Jews, that were his kinsmen according to the flesh, were so fiercely set against him, that they preferred Barabbas, a robber, before him, and sought to stone him, Matt. xxvii. 20; John xi. 8. Thus Cain slays his brother, Ishmael persecutes Isaac, Esau Jacob, and Joseph's brethren sell him. So that if ever that counsel also were in season, it is now, Micah vii. 5, 6, "Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom." Why so? "For the son dishonoureth the father, the daughter riseth up against her mother;" we may add, the servant against his master, the subject against his superior.

8. Beware of strangers. Try men before you trust them. Time discovers men's tempers; the heart of man is so deeply deceitful, that it requires some time to know it; and if it be not safe to trust relations, much less strangers. Hypocrisy is spun with a fine thread, and none are so soon deceived as the over-credulous; and therefore Solomon so oft blames men for trusting strangers, Prov. v. 20; vi. 1, 2. Christ's sheep will not follow strangers, John x. 5.

9. Above all, beware of that evil man thyself. It is a secret, subtle, daily, deadly, bosom enemy, which does us most mischief; we ourselves are the sorest enemies to ourselves, Inimicorum pessimus, quia proximus. All the devils in hell, and all the men in the world, could not hurt us, if we were but true to ourselves. It was a good prayer of St. Austin, Lord, deliver me from that evil man myself. The way to conquer Satan, is first to conquer ourselves. This is the highest and hardest martyrdom, to deny ourselves universally. Let us then walk wisely in this day of England's trial, remembering that the Scripture calls wicked men wolves for ravening, dogs for greediness, lions for cruelty, and foxes for subtlety. Any of these creatures, when enraged, are terrible, and we will take heed of them; but when the cruelty and subtlety of all these creatures shall concentrate and meet in man, how great is the danger, and how had we need to "beware of men," especially when they come with fair pretences, and with "feigned words," veiling over foul matters, 2 Pet. ii. 3; calling pride, decency; error, new lights; hypocrisy, extraordinary sanctity; heretics, the servants of God! The devil knows that if sin should appear in its own proper colours, men would hate it, so ugly and loathsome is it. If Jeroboam had told Israel plainly, they must worship devils, when they worshipped the calves, who would have followed him?

5. They were full of pride. Hos. v. 5; vii. 10. "The pride of Israel testified to his face." They were proud of their riches, and proud of their buildings, and therefore the Lord threatens to "smite the winter-house with the summer-house," which they had built for pride and pleasure, Amos iii. 15.

And is not this England's sin? Was there ever more pride in heart, in habit, in hair, in vestures, gestures, words, and works? And does not pride ever go before destruction, and a high mind before a fall? But of this elsewhere at large.

6. Hypocrisy abounded amongst them; they were like a deceitful bow, that breaks and deceives the archer; they compassed the Lord about with their lies, crying, My Father, my Father, howling before him in their misery, when, alas, their righteousness was but as the morning dew which suddenly vanisheth away, Hos. v. 6; vi. 4; vii. 14, 16; viii. 2; xi. 12; 2 Kings xvii. 9. This made the Lord to reject and abhor both them and their services, Amos v. 21, 22.

And how does this sin reign in England from Dan to Beersheba, from east to west, from one corner of the land to another! Never was the land so full of praying and preaching, lectures, repetitions, private meetings, &c., and never such unmortified, unholy, unrighteous walking, unanswerable to those duties. This abuse and profanation of holy things makes the land to tremble under us, Ezek. xxii. 8. The land is full of science, but where, oh where, is the conscience? The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. Many talk like angels, but live like devils; they talk as if they had cloven tongues, but walk as if they had cloven feet. Most amongst us live directly contrary to their prayers. They pray against pride, and yet their pride is visible; they pray against worldly-mindedness, and yet they are notoriously worldly; they pray for self-denial, and yet are great self-seekers, &c. Oh this cursed hypocrisy, hypocrisy, hypocrisy, ruins all; it is that leaven that sours all our services, that eloquintia that makes our duties deadly. If any sin destroy England, it is this. God may bear with other sins, but this provokes him to his face, and is such a horrid mocking of him, that his soul abhors.

7. The Israelites were great self-seekers. They brought forth fruit, but it was to themselves, Hos. x. 1; they were all for present profit and present pay, like the heifer that loves to "tread out the corn," (where she may eat as she goes,) but loves not ploughing, that is hard and hungry work, Hos. x. 11; they were all for liberty and ease, they could not abide God's yoke, and therefore the Lord tells them, that since they loved liberty so well, they should have enough of it, but to their ruin. Israel was a wanton heifer, the whole pasture could not contain nor content her, and therefore the Lord threatens to give her the liberty of the lamb in the wilderness, where it should be exposed to a thousand dangers and miseries, Hos. iv. 16.

And is not this the great sin of England? Was there ever less self-denial, and more self-seeking in the land? Where shall we find a plain, simple, single-hearted Jacob, that prefers God's glory before his own interest, and can be content to perish, so that God's name may flourish? Show me, O show me that man, that I may give thanks unto God for him.

Most men in our days are squint-eyed: they pray, hear, repent, fast, give alms, but still they have an eye to themselves in all their actions, Zech. vii. 5; Matt. vi. 2.

And as Ephraim, so England is all for liberty; liberty in church, and liberty in state; liberty in spirituals, and liberty in temporals. We have those that, like sons of Heliad, can bear no yoke, none must *omi inprobum qui proba loquitur ver-

ba. Menander.*

In oculis Dei nullum majus scelus est hy-pocritar. Scallier.

reign over them. They must have liberty, liberty, liberty; and I will "proclaim a liberty for you, saith the Lord, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine." This is the portion of such libertines, Jer. xxxiv. 17.

8. Witchcraft and enchantments. This also was a sin which helped to ruin Ephraim. They had familiarity with the devil, and by his aid they could divine and enchant, 2 Kings xvii. 17.

And was there ever more witchcraft in England than at this day? Oh this sinning sin grows rife amongst us. Those seducing, deluding, quaking sots and sectaries, that go up and down the land with their enchanting ribbons, and other diabolical practices, plainly show that too many of them are in league with the devil. They talk much of the Spirit moving and the Spirit leading them; their bastards, their railing, and their blasphemy, show that it is an evil spirit that leads them.

This sin helped to ruin the Jews: "Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people the house of Jacob, because they are soothsayers like the Philistines," Isa. ii. 6. If England be guilty of the like sin, it must also look for the like punishment.

9. Barrenness under the means of grace. God was not wanting in any means of grace to Ephraim, but Ephraim was an empty vine, and wanting to himself, Hos. x. 1.

This also is the great sin of England, we are dead under lively oracles, and fruitless under fruitful ordinances, and lean under soul-enriching means; like Pharaoh's lean kine, that devoured the fat ones, yet themselves were still lean, Gen. xli. 20, 21. We dishonour the Lord's pastures and discredit his ordinances by our unfruitfulness, and open the mouths of the wicked to cry, Ecce quales sunt qui Christum colunt! Behold how dead and dull, how base and barren, how unholy and unrighteous, these Christians are! Such barren ground is "nigh unto cursing," Heb. vi. 8. Which of us will plough the rocks, or sow the sands, or bestow cost upon ground which will bring forth nothing but briars and thorns? The barren fig tree was cut down, because it cumbered the earth, and made the ground about it the worse, Luke xiii. 6—9. The fig tree that had nothing but bare leaves of profession, was cursed for want of fruit, Mark xi. 13, 14. God will lay his axe to the root of those trees that bring not forth good fruit, Matt. iii. 10; and lay waste his vineyard, and command the clouds to rain no more rain upon it, when after all his cost and care it brings forth nothing but "wild grapes," Isa. v. 2—7. When the Lord comes to walk in the beautiful vineyard of his church, and finds a tree that flourishes not in so fruitful a soil, he will cut it down, it shall no longer cumber the ground.

Our great unfruitfulness under the rich means that we enjoy should deeply affect us. If Hannah wept for the barrenness of her body, how should we lament the barrenness of our souls, and cry, as Rachel, "Give me children, or else I die!" so, Give me grace, or I am undone; make me fruitful, or I perish for ever. Complain to God against it; the best and most fruitful Christians have made the saddest complaints against themselves. Holy Bradford, how oft did he lament over that deadness, unfruitfulness, unthankfulness, which cleaved to his nature! David, how oft does he beg for quickening grace! Do by your barren hearts, as men do by their barren grounds; they will dig, dung, drain them, and use all means to make them fruitful: so do you; pray, read, meditate, hear, confer, and use all means to get your dead hearts bettered, and your graces quickened.

Yet, lest any should deceive themselves, thinking that they grow in grace, when they do but deceive themselves, you must know that. 1. There may be a growing in gifts, when there is no growing in grace. Many a man knows more, and can pray longer, than formerly, and yet no growth in grace. True growth is principally internal in the root, in humiliation, sanctification, faith, obedience; it is a growing up, not only in some things, but in all things, Eph. iv. 15. True growth is universal, it is not only a growing in the head, (as some that have the rickets do,) but in heart, head, and every part. True growth, saith Aristotle, is a diffusing of nourishment to all the parts, the understanding, will, memory, affections, body, soul, all are bettered.

2. It may be you do grow, but do you grow answerably to all the means and mercies which God has bestowed upon you? They that have much, of them shall be much required. Where the husbandman bestows extraordinary cost, there he expects an extraordinary crop; and herein the best of us all have great cause to be humbled in the dust. Who can say he has answered the Lord's cost and care, and grown answerably to all those sermons, sabbaths, sacraments, good books, corrections, and all the other rich means which God has afforded us in these latter days? Oh what giants might we have been in the ways of grace and goodness, if every ordinance had been effectual upon our hearts! he that is weak amongst us might have been as strong as David, and he that is strong as David might have been as an angel of the Lord, for wisdom and purity, Zech. xii. 8. Like Saul, we might have been taller by the head and shoulders (in the ways of grace) than other men. Our leanness, and our lewdness, our barrenness, and unfruitfulness, our walking so unanswerably to the rich means of grace that we enjoy, certainly foretell a storm approaching.

10. Ingratitude, and abuse of God's mercies to the promoting of idolatry. The more God did for them, the less they did for him; their fulness bred forgetfulness, and the more they were increased, the more they sinned. Hence the Lord so oft complains of this sin, as provoking him more than all the rest, Hos. ii. 8; iv. 7; x. 1; xi. 3, 4; xiii. 5, 6. It was this sin especially that brought the sword upon them, Hos. ii. 9; xiii. 7. The prophet Amos also, who was contemporary with Hosea, notably sets forth the great ingratitude of this people in abusing God's mercies, Amos ii. 9—11.

And is not this that crying sin of England? Do we not fight against God with his own blessings, abusing our health, wealth, wit, peace, plenty, corn, wine, gold, silver, Scriptures, ordinances, yea, all our comforts and creatures, to the dishonour of the Giver of them? His mercies make us proud, his riches covetous, his peace secure, his food intemperate, and all his benefits serve us but as weapons to rebel against him.

And do we thus requite the Lord, O foolish and unwise? is this the thanks we give him for all his patience, preservations, success, and deliverances? Will not the Lord visit for these things? and shall not his soul be avenged on such a nation as this? Had England no more sins to answer for but this, even this were sufficient to make it a desolation, as it did Samaria.

11. Covenant-breaking. God had betrothed them to himself, and chosen them from the rest of the world, to become his people; "But they like men have transgressed the covenant; there have they dealt treacherously against me," Hos. vi. 7; x. 4. Like sons of Adam, they walked in his steps; though they were abundantly blessed by God, yet they revolted from him, and transgressed the covenant; there, even there, where they should have been most faithful, viz. in the covenant, there they dealt most falsely and perfidiously with him.

And is not this one of the crying sins of England? Never was there a wiser and better composed covenant in the nation, and never any worse performed; we have lifted up our hands to the most High, that we will

(in our places and callings) extirpate heresies, and yet many walk as if they had taken a covenant to propagate them; many amongst us make no more of their covenants, than an ape does of his collar, which he can put off or on at his own pleasure.

Let any man but read all the branches of the covenant, and then compare with them our contrary walking; and he cannot but admire the infinite patience of the Lord, that he has not long since sent a sword to avenge the quarrel of his covenant upon us, Lev. xxvi. 25. We must not think to do such things, and escape, or to break our covenants with God, and then be delivered, Ezek. xvii. 15—20. If the Lord so sadly avenged the breach of covenant with a man, yea, with a heathen, and idolater, what shall be done to him who breaks his covenant made with the great God of heaven and earth? and if a good man will perform the covenant which he has made, though it be to his disadvantage, how great is their sin then, who perform not the conditions of such covenants as tend to their everlasting welfare! Psal. xv. 4. The Jews have a saying, that there is no punishment that befalls them, but there is in it a dram of the golden calf: so there is no misery that befalls England, but there is in it a dram of covenant-breaking.

12. Security. Though "strangers had devoured his strength," yet he knew it not; the Syrian and Assyrian had consumed him, and made a prey of him, yet such was his stupidity, that he knew it not, viz. with a practical, saving knowledge, so as to repent, and make a right use of it: "yea, grey hairs are here and there upon him," which were a sign of weakness, and old age, and approaching death; yet they laid it not to heart, Hos. vii. 9; but they were at ease in Zion, and trusted in the mountain of Samaria, putting the evil day far from them, and therefore a woe is denounced against them, Amos vi. 1, 3; ix. 10.

And was there ever more security and senseless stupidity in England than at this day? Do not the ministers of Christ generally complain that they see not that life, zeal, activity, tenderness, compunction, in their people, which formerly existed? Many applaud and flatter themselves with their gifts and external profession of sanctity, but the power of it is very much wanting amongst us. A great calm oftentimes is a forerunner of a storm; and great security is a great forerunner of some great judgment. When the old world was eating, drinking, buying, building, marrying, and thought not of a flood, then it came and swept them all away; when men cry Peace and safety, then comes sudden and swift destruction, 1 Thess. v. 3.

13. Anarchy. They "have devoured their judges, all their kings are fallen," Hos. vii. 7. They discovered their rage in their seditious and frequent conspiracies, to the devouring and destroying of their judges and magistrates, as appears in the frequent murders of their kings.

What anarchy and confusion is amongst us, he is a great stranger in our English Israel that knows not.

14. Lukewarmness. This is another sin that helped to ruin Ephraim. Hos. vii. 8, "Ephraim is a cake not turned," and so but half-baked, or dough-baked; neque crudus, neque coctus, neither hot nor cold, neither fish nor flesh, but of a middle, mongrel religion, halting between two, partly for God and partly for the devil, partly for Christ and partly for Baal: but God hates such halting, half-hearted doings; and therefore spews them out of his mouth, and sends them packing into captivity.

And is not this the sin of England? are we not a lukewarm generation, neither hot nor cold, that halt not between two, but two hundred opinions? We have a knee for God, and a knee for Baal; a tongue for Christ, and a tongue for antichrist; a tongue for truth, and a tongue for falsehood; like the harlot, we are all for dividing: but God will be served truly and totally, without halting or halving; he has made our whole hearts, and he will have all, or none at all. Oh, this sin of formality and lukewarmness cries for some judgment against us. Where is our zeal for God's glory? our mourning for the great dishonours that are done to his name? our crying out and witnessing against the blasphemies, heresies, juggling, and Satanical delusions that abound amongst us? Nay, do not many plead for a general toleration of all sorts and sects? and if under a colour they make a law against such, yet it is either made so wide that offenders creep through, or the rulers are so overawed that they dare only admonish when they should punish, and barely shave the head which of right should be cut off.

Now, will not the Lord visit for these things? and shall not his soul be avenged on such a cold and careless nation as this is?

15. Divisions. Ephraim was against Manasses, and Manasses against Ephraim; there was division upon division amongst them; their sins had divided them from their God, and now God in his just judgment sets a spirit of division amongst themselves to their destruction. Hos. x. 2, "Their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty;" or, as some render the word, they shall be ruined. For desolations in a state oft follow divisions in the church, as we see in Poland, Germany, and elsewhere.

And was England ever more sadly divided and subdivided than at this day? What separations and subdivisions are found amongst us? One is of Paul, another of Apollos; divisions in principles, divisions in practice, divisions in judgment, and divisions in affection; divisions in church, and divisions in state: for the divisions of England there be sad thoughts of heart. Jerusalem's divisions were Jerusalem's ruin; the Lord grant that England's divisions prove not England's ruin. These give the enemy great advantage against us, and encourage them to set upon us. When Israel and Judah were at variance, then comes Shishak the Egyptian and troubles Jerusalem, 2 Chron. xii. 2.

It is observed, that England was never conquered but when it was divided within itself. Oh that God who has made our hearts would mend them, and unite them, that we may never lose our religion, laws, estates, persons, posterity, and all that is dear to us, and lay ourselves open to the malice of a bloody enemy, who has no way to overthrow us sooner than by our sinful dissensions.

Dom pugnant singuli, vincuntur universi. Tacitus.

16. Carnal-confidence. For this sin they are frequently reproved; one while they trusted in their kings; anon they go down to Egypt for help, and then seek to the Assyrian: they forsook the Lord, and trusted in an arm of flesh, which yet could not help them in their troubles, Hos. v. 13; vii. 11; xii. 1; xiii. 10.

And does not this sin abound in England? Have not we trusted in kings, princes, protectors, parliaments, armies, navies, &c.? We have leaned upon our staves, till we have broken them all, and ruined our carnal-confidences by idolizing them.

17. Incurribleness under lesser judgments. God had been as "a moth" to Ephraim, which consumed him by little and little; but since that did not better him, the Lord came as "a lion" against him, and tore him all to pieces, Hos. v. 12, 14. Like a good physician, he used all means to heal them, Hos. vii. 1, by his word, by his mercies, by his judgments; but since nothing would mend them, the Lord swears by himself, to root up them, and their posterity, for their stubbornness, Amos iv.

And is not this our sin? Has not the Lord used all gentle means, and spent all his lesser rods, in vain upon us? Who can say he has been the better for all

Plectimur sed non flectimur, corripi-mur sed non corri-pimur. Salvia.

the agues, fevers, taxes, poverty, sickness, or any of those lesser rods which God has laid upon us? May not the Lord complain of England as he did sometime of Israel for their incorrigibility? Amos iv. 6—12. Thus and thus have I done to you, "yet have ye not returned to me, saith the Lord;" and therefore now will I bring some greater judgment on you, unless by repentance you "prepare to meet thy God," and so prevent his wrath.

18. Oppression and cruelty. They acted their oppressions on the poor in a violent, virulent manner, which brought destruction upon them, Amos iii. 9—12; iv. 2. They used false weights, and loved to oppress; they were all for getting, though it were by force and forgery, Hos. xii. 7.

And does not this sin reign amongst us? Was there ever more racking of tenants, and grinding of the faces of the poor? Was there ever more cozening, cheating, overreaching, and unrighteous dealing in the land, and that by some who pretend to an extraordinary measure of religion. I believe the like has not been known in the memory of man. Our forefathers had less light and knowledge, but there was far more plainness and single-heartedness in those days than characterizes ours.

I have but little dealing in the world, (had I less I should be well contented,) yet I must profess, that I can scarce tell where to find a plain, simple, single-hearted Nathanael. Let such know that God abominates them, Deut. xxv. 13—16, and will be avenged on them, 1 Thess. i. 6. The whole land fares the worse for such. This was one of those sins, amongst the rest, that brought judgments on Jerusalem, and will certainly bring judgments on London, and the rest of our cities where such enormities abound, Ezek. xxii. 12, 29, 31.

19. Atheism. They forgot God days without number, he was not in all their thoughts. Hence the Lord so oft complains, that they knew him not, nor considered that he remembered all their doings, Hos. ii. 5, 8, 13; v. 4; vii. 2.

Atheism at this day is the crying sin of England; we are not in so much danger of papism now as of atheism. How has this God-provoking, land-ruining sin overspread the whole island! We have all sorts of atheism amongst us, mental, vocal, vital.

1. We have close atheists, and gross atheists; we have atheists contemplative, and atheists practical. Some are closer atheists, they do not directly and plainly cast God out of the world; yet these fools (who are the world's wise men) say in their hearts, "There is no God," Psal. xiv. 1. This kind of atheism is not so easily discovered, nor reproved, and so it wants that help which gross atheism meets withal.

2. Many that confess God in their words, yet deny him in their works, and by consequence deny his all-seeing eye and being, as if God took no notice of things below; these are practical atheists, Tit. i. 16. Eliphaz sets the brand of wickedness upon the forehead of this sin, Job xxii. 5, 13, 14; and God threatens to search, as "with candles," for such atheistical ones, that is, he will search narrowly, and sift them thoroughly, as the woman that lighted a candle to search for her lost groat, Zeph. i. 12. Yet atheism is frequently acted in the world in one degree or other: Psal. x. 4, "The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God;" that is, he thinks he has no need of him, but has enough in himself, and therefore he will not go to God: "God is not in all his thoughts;" a Hebraism, signifying he is in none of his thoughts, no, not in one of his thoughts or ways. The devil would fain make men not believe that which he himself cannot but believe, viz. that there is a God. This is one of the highest degrees of wickedness in the world. To deny God is so high a sin that it takes away all at once, the devil needs not come a second time. This is to sin against the greatest light; it is not only a sin against the light of Christianity, but against the light of nature, against the witness of the creature, and the whole creation. Such sin against the providence of God, and against the common consent of all nations. Tully could say, There was never any nation so barbarous as to deny that there was a God. I have seen a city without walls, but never any city but acknowledged a God. I have heard of some that have denied that there was a God; yet never knew the man, but, when he was sick, would seek unto God for help. Therefore, saith Seneca, they do but lie that say there is no God; they sin against the light of their own consciences; they who most studiously go about to deny God, yet cannot do it, but some check of conscience will fly in their faces: hence heathens have condemned some to death that denied there was a God. This is a mother-sin, and the root of all abominations, yea, in every sin there is a virtual, tacit, interpretative atheism; they say, as it were, in their hearts, that God does not see, Psal. xiv. 1—3; lxxiii. 11, 12; xciv. 5—9. This sin ruined Jerusalem, Ezek. ix. 9, and if it spread in England as it has done of late years, it will certainly ruin us also.

We all carry the root of this prolific sin about us, and in every sin there is a grain, at least, of atheism. When we are charged with it we are apt to say, as Hazael, "But what, is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" he would not believe that there was so much wickedness in him. "The Lord hath showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria," answered the prophet, and then thy corruptions will soon appear, when thou hast power and opportunity to act them. So say I, thou art a son of Adam, lapsed and fallen in him, thou hast the seed of this sin within thee, and when a temptation comes it will quickly discover itself to the world.

Take heed of polytheism, which is the ready way to atheism; the having of many gods is the ready way to have no God. An omni religion is the ready way to no religion. The world abounds with false gods. Our gods are,

1. Whatsoever we love more than God, that is our god: Amor tuus, Deus tuus.

2. Whatsoever we confide in more than God, is our god, Job xxxi. 24.

3. Whatever we glory and rejoice in more than God, Jer. ix. 23; Phil. iii. 19.

4. Whatever we ascribe efficiency to, Hab. i. 16. God will have all power ascribed to himself, Deut. viii. 12, 13, 17, 18.

5. Whatever we obey against the mind of God, be it friend or foe, men or devils, that we make our god.

20. Their sin was full, and they ripe for ruin. God had borne with their provocations about two hundred and sixty years, even till they had filled up the measure of their sins, and then he brought destruction on them.

Now Ephraim's sin was full in respect of, 1. Multitude. 2. Magnitude. 3. Strength. 4. Growth. 5. Impudency. 6. Obstinacy.

There was a fullness in respect of, 1. Multitude. 1. All sorts of sin abounded, both in doctrine and manners; there was idolatry, adultery, murder, witchcraft, lying, stealing, oppression, 2 Kings xvii. 9—11; Hos. iv. 1, 2; vii. 7; Amos ii. 6. 2. All sorts of sinners abounded, high and low, princes, priests, and people, all were idolaters, and delighted in false worship, Hos. v. 1; Micah vii. 3—6.

This universality of sinning is ever a forerunner of judgment: when all the old world had corrupted themselves, then came the flood; when all Sodom was wicked, and all Jerusalem rebelled, when "the mean man boweth down" to idols, "and the great man humbleth himself," then God will not forgive, Isa. i. 5, 6; ii. 9; Jer. v. 1—7; vii. 18, 19.

2. Magnitude; which is a forerunner of destruction. When the sins in themselves are great, as idolatry, witchcraft, hypocrisy, apostacy, and these sins are heightened by circumstances, being committed against great light, love, patience, &c. This was Ephraim's, I wish it were not also England's, case.

3. Strength. When men do wickedly "with both hands," that is, earnestly and actively, Micah vii. 3. When men "draw iniquity with cords of vanity," and study how they may do mischief with all their might, Isa. v. 18; Ezek. xxii. 6.

4. Growth. When men "sin more and more," as Ephraim did, Hos. xiii. 2, and grow "worse and worse," 2 Tim. iii. 13, persevering in their sin without end or measure, this also prognosticates ruin to a nation. The Lord did not presently destroy the Amorites, but suffered their sin to come to its fulness, that he might pour upon them the fulness of his fury; Gen. xv. 16, "The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full." Though they were notoriously wicked, yet he bears with them till their sins were ripe for ruin. A woman must go her forty weeks till the child be come to perfection, and then comes her travail suddenly and surely. So sin has its conception, rise, reign, and ruin, Psal. vii. 14; James i. 15.

5. Impudency. When men declare their sins like Sodom, and openly profess their wickedness with "a whore's forehead" that refuses to be ashamed, Isa. iii. 9; Jer. iii. 3; vi. 15; Zeph. iii. 5.

6. Obstinacy. When nothing can reclaim a people, but they are resolutely wicked, as Ephraim here, who was married to idols, and would not return, being deeply rooted in iniquity, Hos. iv. 17; v. 4; ix. 9. They sold themselves to do wickedly, 2 Kings xvii. 17; they would not be warned by the falls of others, whom God had punished before them for the same sins, 2 Kings xvii. 8—15, but rejected the counsel of his Prophets, till the wrath of the Lord broke forth, and there was no remedy, as you may see, 2 Kings xvii. 7—24, where you have Ephraim's sins, and Ephraim's punishment, fully set forth.

Now what could the Lord do less than root up such a people, so obstinate under reproofs, so unthankful for mercies, so incorrigible under judgments, so incapable of repentance, so impatient of remedies, so impatient under all the means of grace which God had afforded them?

Let us now reflect upon ourselves, and see whether Ephraim's sins be not England's sins: if so, parity of sins will bring parity of judgments; if our sins run parallel with those of Ephraim, we may justly expect Ephraim's downfall.

It is said of Lot, that his righteous soul was vexed with the sins of Sodom, 2 Pet. ii. 7, 8; the original signifies, his soul was racked and tormented when he saw the abominations ἐθασάμειζεν ἢ βασάμειζεν, torques, ἢ βασάμειζεν, ἔπει λ' δ' αἰν, cruciatus quiritis. of the Sodomites. These twenty sins which abound in England, and forebode some approaching judgment, should even rack and torment our souls with grief, that so we may be marked for mercy when judgment comes, Ezek. ix. 4; Hab. iii. 16.

Lastly, their rulers were corrupt, their kings, princes, judges, were idolaters, revoltors, violaters of the law, bribers, &c., Hos. iv. 18, 19; v. 13; ix. 15; and the people were corrupted by them, for where the head is rotten, the members cannot be sound. Of all the twenty kings of Israel (after the division of the state) there was not one good from first to last, they were all idolaters; which serves to clear and vindicate the justice of God in the utter overthrow of those kings, and their kingdom, who had for the space of two hundred and thirty-seven, or two hundred and sixty years, abused the goodness and patience of the Lord.

On the whole matter, the counsel which the Lord gave to Ephraim, shall I give to England, Hos. xiv. 1—3. Return, O backsliding England, from thy atheism, apostacy, heresy, blasphemy, hypocrisy, formality, ingratitude, witchcraft, security, anarchy, and take with you words of sincere confession, and turn unfeignedly to the Lord; so will he receive you graciously, and accept both of your persons and performances.

Israel's Prayer in Time of Trouble,

WITH

GOD'S GRACIOUS ANSWER THEREUNTO.

---

A N E X P L I C A T I O N

OF THE

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER OF HOSEA ;

IN SEVEN SERMONS,

PREACHED IN MARGARET'S CHURCH, AT WESTMINSTER, BEFORE THE HONOURABLE HOUSE OF COMMONS, NOW ASSEMBLED IN PARLIAMENT.

BY EDWARD REYNOLDS,

MINISTER OF THE WORD OF GOD AT BRAUNSTON IN NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, AND A MEMBER OF THE ASSEMBLY OF DIVINES.

PUBLISHED BY ORDER OF THE SAID HOUSE.

TO THE

HONOURABLE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

ASSEMBLED IN PARLIAMENT.

IN obedience to your commands, I here humbly present to your view, what you were pleased with patience and readiness of affection lately to attend unto. I considered, that though the choiceness of the auditory might require the exactest preparation, yet, both the condition of the times, and the nature of the duty, called upon us to lay aside our ornaments. And therefore I spake with such plainness, as might commend the matter delivered rather to the conscience of a penitent, than to the fancy of a delicate hearer. The king of Nineveh was a king as well in his sackcloth as in his robes: and the truth of God is indeed fuller of majesty when it is naked, than when adorned with the dress of any human contribution, which many times takes from it, but never adds to it any value.

I looked upon you in your double relation, both common, as Christians, and special, as men intrusted with the managing of those arduous and most pressing difficulties under which this distempered kingdom is now groaning.

And for the quickening of those endeavours which belong to you in both these relations, I presented you both with the bottom of a nation's unhappiness, which is sin; and with the top of their felicity, which is God's free grace and favour: that by your serious cares to purge out the one and to procure the other, you might, by God's blessing on your consultations, dispel that black tempest which hangs over this kingdom, and reduce the face of things to calmness and serenity again.

When the children struggled together in the womb of Rebekah, she was thereupon inquisitive, "If it be so, why am I thus?" Gen. xxv. 22; and she addressed herself to God for a resolution. Surely this nation is become like the womb of Rebekah, the children thereof struggling together in their common mother; and when God has mercifully freed us from foreign enemies, brethren are become enemies to brethren, and by their enmities likely to tear and torment the bowels of their mother, and to ruin themselves.

And what have we now to do, but to inquire the cause of these sad commotions, Why are we thus? And surely the cause is chiefly where the disease is, within ourselves. We have been like the womb of Rebekah, a barren nation, not bringing forth fruits for the so many mercies with which God has filled us. So that now it is no wonder if God cause us to be in pain within our own bowels, and to feel the throes and "sorrows of a travailing woman," Hos. xiii. 13, ready to bring forth her own confusion, a Benoni or an Ichabod, a son of sorrow or a son of shame, to this hitherto so peaceable and flourishing kingdom.

All that we can comfort ourselves with in these pangs and qualms of distemper is, that there are some Jacobs amongst us, who, instead of supplanting their brethren, will wrestle and have power with God, Gen. xxxii. 24; Hos. xii. 3, 4. The people have often petitioned, sometimes his sacred Majesty, sometimes this Honourable House, which are his great council, many overtures and endeavours of accommodation have been tendered, and yet we cry out in our pangs, and have, as it were, brought forth wind, neither have we wrought any deliverance in the earth, Isa. xxvi. 17, 18.

I have here, therefore, presented a new petition, dictated and drawn up to our hands by God's own Spirit, to which both king and parliament, peers, and prophets, and people, must all subscribe, and offer it with prostrate and penitent hearts to Him who "standeth in the congregation of the mighty;" and "judgeth among the gods," that he would "take away all" our "iniquity;" and "receive us" into favour again, and accept of a covenant of new obedience, Psal. lxxxii. 1; Hos. xiv. 2.

And this petition God is pleased to anticipate with an answer of grace in the consequent parts of the chapter whence the text is taken, and that particularly to every branch of the petition. He will take away iniquity. His anger shall not punish, his love shall heal our backslidings, the greatness of our sins shall not hinder the freeness of his grace. He will do us good, and give us life, by the dew of his grace reviving us; and glory, clothing us, like the lily of the field, with the beauty of holiness; and stability, fixing us by his grace, as the cedars of Lebanon are fastened upon their roots; and growth, or enlargement, as the branches spread forth themselves; and continual vigour and plenty, as the olive tree, which is always green and fruitful; and glorious comforts by the sweet savour of the knowledge of God, which, like the spice trees of Lebanon, shall diffuse a spiritual perfume upon the names, and into the consciences, of penitent converts.

He will prevent us with the blessings of safety, as well as of sanctity and comfort; we shall, under his shadow, find shelter and protection from all our fears. Though, like corn, we be harrowed under the clods; though, like a lopped vine, we seem naked and reduced to lowness; though, like crushed grapes, we lie under heavy pressures; yet he will receive, and enlarge, and comfort us again; and when we are in our own eyes as fatherless children, he will set his eyes upon us as a tutor and guardian; he will hear, and observe, and answer, and pity us, enabling us to make good our covenant by his grace, and causing the fruit of his loving-kindness to be found upon us. Thus God is pleased to borrow the various perfection of other things to adumbrate the united and accumulated mercies which he promises to a turning and petitioning people.

You have the petition sent you from God, and his answer preventing you in all the members of it with the blessings of goodness. I have nothing else to do, but to beg of you, and of all this great people whom you represent, the subscription of your hearts and lives to this petition; and to beg of God, that he would graciously incline the hearts of this whole kingdom, rather to wrestle with him for a blessing, than to struggle and conflict amongst themselves for a curse. With which prayer I humbly conclude, commending your persons and your weighty affairs to his grace; and rest,

Your most humble servant in Christ,

EDWARD REYNOLDS.

From my study in Braunston, August the 8th, 1642.

CHAPTER XIV.

VERSE 1—3.

O Israel, return unto the Lord thy God; for thou hast fallen by thine iniquity. Take with you words, and turn to the Lord: say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips. Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.

THE blessing of Ephraim was, according to the signification of his name, fruitfulness, Gen. xli. 52; the fruitfulness of the earth, a bough by a well, and the fruitfulness of the womb, and of the breasts, Gen. xlix. 22, 25; Deut. xxxiii. 13—17. Contrary to which two blessings, we find in our prophet two judgments threatened against him for his sins; chap. xiii. 15, 16, "Though he be fruitful among his brethren, an east wind shall come, the wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up: he shall spoil the treasure of all pleasant vessels. Samaria shall become desolate; for she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword: their infants shall be dashed in pieces, and their women with child shall be ripped up." And throughout the whole prophecy, (if you read and observe it,) you will find the judgments of God against Ephraim to be expressed by weeds, emptiness, barrenness, dryness of roots, of fruits, of branches, of springs, and by a curse upon their children; as, on the other side, the blessings here in this chapter renewed to Ephraim repenting, are all expressed by metaphors of fruitfulness, ver. 5—7.

From these two awful judgments, against the fruitfulness of their springs, and the fruitfulness of their wombs, by the desolations of a bloody sword, our prophet takes occasion once more to awaken and drive them to a timely repentance, that so they may recover the blessing of their name; Ephraim may be Ephraim again, a plentiful, a fruitful, a flourishing people. That "when God's judgments are in the earth," they would then, at least, set themselves to "learn righteousness," that they may wash their feet in the blood of the wicked.

Of all nations under heaven this land of ours has had the blessing of Ephraim upon it, fruitfulness of the earth, abundance of plenty; fruitfulness of the womb, abundance of people. But our misery is, that the abundance of our sins has mightily outvied the abundance both of our plenty and of our people; sins, also, too parallel to those of Ephraim. And this parity of sins has no doubt called upon God for a parity of judgments. It is but a very little while since the Lord seemed to call for a north wind, as he does here for an east wind; two armies there met, ready to look one another in the face; but his heart turned, his repentings were kindled, he would not give up Ephraim then. He seems now once more to be drawing a sword, and having in vain "hewed" us by his "prophets," as he complains, Hos. vi. 5, to try whether hewing us by his judgments will work upon us. So that now, though I must read my text, "O Israel," yet I must apply it, O England, "return unto the Lord thy God; for thou hast fallen by thine iniquity. Take with you words, and turn to the Lord: say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips."

The whole context contains two general parts:

I. An invitation to repentance, ver. 1.

II. An institution how to perform it, ver. 2, 3.

Before we come to the particulars of the invitation, let us first briefly observe, That in the midst of judgments proposed against obstinate sinners, God reserves and proclaims mercy to sinners that are penitent. When a consumption is decreed, yet a remnant is reserved to return, Isa. x. 22, 23. The Lord will keep his "vineyard," when he will burn up "the briars and thorns" together, Isa. xxvii. 2—4. When a day of "fierce anger" is determined, the "mEEK of the earth" are called upon to seek the Lord, Zeph. ii. 3. When the Lord is coming "out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity," he calls upon his people to "hide" themselves in their "chambers," "until the indignation be overpast," Isa. xxvi. 20, 21. The angel which was sent to destroy Sodom, had withal a commission to deliver Lot, Gen. xix. 15. God made full provision for those who mourned for public abominations, before he gave order to destroy the rest, Ezek. ix. 4, 6. Men in their wrath will many times rather strike a friend than spare a foe; but God's proceedings are without disorder, he will rather spare his foes than strike his servants, as he showed himself willing to have done in the case of Sodom, Gen. xviii. 26. "Moses stood before him in the breach," and diverted judgments from Israel," Psal. cvi. 23. Yea, God seeks for such, Ezek. xxii. 30, and complains when they cannot be found, Ezek. xiii. 5; and if he deliver others for them, certainly he will not destroy them for others. However it go with the world and with wicked men, it shall go well with the righteous; there shall be a sanctuary for them when others stumble, and they shall pass through the fire when others are consumed by it, Isa. iii. 10, 11; viii. 14—16; Zech. xiii. 8, 9. The reasons of this tender care are,

1. God's justice. He will not punish the righteous with the wicked; he will have it appear that there is a difference "between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not," Gen. xviii. 23; Mal. iii. 18.

2. God's love to his people. He has "a book of remembrance" written before him, for them that fear him, and think upon his name. "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him," Mal. iii. 16, 17. Here is a climax and gradation of arguments drawn from love. In a great fire, and devouring trouble, (such as is threatened, Mal. iv. 1,) property alone is a ground of care; a man would willingly save and secure that which is his own, and of any use to him; but if you add to this preciousness, that increases the care. A man will make hard shift to deliver a rich cabinet of jewels, though all his ordinary goods and utensils should perish. But of all jewels, those which come out of the body are much more precious than those which only adorn it. Who would not snatch rather his child than his casket or purse out of a flame? Relation works not only upon the affection, but upon the bowels, Jer. xxxi. 20. And lastly, the same excellency that the word "jewel" adds to the word "mine;" the same excellency does "service" add to the word

Παράδειγμα
τοῖς ἄλλοις γίνεσθαι ἵνα ἄλλοι φρονῆτες πάσχοντα ἀν' ἡμαρτοῦ φοβημένοι βέλτερον γινώσκωσι. Πλάτο ἀριθ. α. Γα. 1. 6.
c. 14.

"son." A man has much conflict in himself to take off his heart from an undutiful son. Never a worse son than Absalom, and yet how does David give a charge to the commanders to have him spared! How inquisitive after his safety! how passionately and unseasonably mournful upon the news of his death! But if any child be more a jewel than another, certainly it is a dutiful child, who has not only an interest in our love by nature, but by obedience. All these grounds of care and protection for God's people in trouble are here expressed; property, they are "mine;" preciousness, they are "jewels;" treasures, ornaments unto me; relation, they are "sons;" usefulness, they are sons that "serve;" none could look on a thing so many ways lovely with the same eye as upon a professed and provoking enemy.

3. God's name and glory. He has spared his people even in the midst of their provocations for his name's sake, Deut. xxxiii. 26, 27; Josh. vii. 9. How much more when they repent and seek his face! He will never let it be said, that any seek the Lord in vain, Isa. xlv. 19.

But it may be objected, Does not Solomon say, that "all things come alike to all?" and that "no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before him?" Eccl. ix. 1, 2. And is it not certain and common, that in public desolations good as well as bad do perish? Does not the sword devour as well one as another?

True, God does not always difference his servants from wicked men by temporal deliverances; troubles commonly and promiscuously involve all sorts. But there are these two things in it to be considered:

1. Many times the good suffer with the bad, because they are together corrupted with them; and when they join in the common provocations, no wonder if they suffer in the common judgments, Rev. xviii. 4. Nay, the sins of God's people do (especially in this case) more provoke him to outward judgments than the sins of his professed enemies; because they expose his name to the more contempt, 2 Sam. xii. 14; and are committed against the greater love, Amos iii. 2; and he has future judgment for the wicked, and therefore usually begins here at his own sanctuary, Ezek. ix. 6; 1 Pet. iv. 17.

2. The good men, who have preserved themselves from public sins, do yet fall by public judgments, still there is a great difference in this seeming equality, the same affliction having, like the pillar that went before Israel, a light side towards God's people, and a dark side towards the Egyptians, God usually recompensing the outward evils of his people with more plentiful evidences of inward and spiritual joy. A good man may be in great darkness as well as a wicked man, but in that case he has the name of God to stay himself upon, which no wicked man in the world has, Isa. l. 10. The metal and the dross go both into the fire together, but the dross is consumed, the metal refined. So is it with godly and wicked in their sufferings, Zech. xiii. 9; Eccl. viii. 12, 13.

This reproves the folly of those who in time of trouble rely upon vain things which cannot help them, and continue their sins still. For judgments make no difference of any but penitent and impenitent. Sickness stands not on ceremony with an honourable person, but uses him as coarsely as the base. Death knocks as well at a prince's palace as a poor man's cottage; wise men die as well as fools. Yea, poison usually works more violently when tempered with wine, than with some duller and baser material. In times of trouble usually the greater the persons the closer the judgments. When Jerusalem was taken the nobles were slain, but the poor of the land had vineyards and fields given them, Jer. xxxix. 6—10.

Therefore in troubles we should be more humbled for our sins than our sufferings, because sin is the sting of suffering. That mercies should not win us; that judgment should not awaken us; that the rod should speak, and we not hear, Micah vi. 9; that the fire should burn, and we not feel, Isa. xlii. 25; that desolation should be threatened, and we not instructed, Jer. vi. 8; that the hand of God should be lifted up, and we not see it, Isa. xxvi. 11; that darkness should be upon us, and we not give glory to God, Jer. xiii. 16: this is that which should most deject us, in mercies to have been wanton, and in judgments senseless. Get repentance by an affliction, and then you may look on it as a traffic, and not as a trouble, like a merchant's voyage, which has pain in the way, but treasure in the end. No afflictions can hurt him that is penitent. If thou escape, they will make thee the more thankful; if not, they will bring thee the nearer and the sooner to God.

The way to be safe in times of trouble, is to get the blood of the Lamb upon our doors. All troubles have their commission and instructions from God, what to do, whither to go, whom to touch, whom to pass over. Be bold, and though the fire come upon you, you shall keep your nature and purity still. "Godliness," saith the apostle, "hath the promise of this life," and in that general promise one special clause, that we shall not "be tempted above that we are able," 1 Cor. x. 13; neither are there indeed any distresses against which there is not a refuge and escape for penitent sinners to some promise or other. Against captivity. "When they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly," Lev. xxvi. 44. Against famine and pestilence. "If I shut up heaven that there be no rain, or if I command the locusts to devour the land, or if I send pestilence among my people; if my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land," 2 Chron. vii. 13, 14. Against sickness. "The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness," Psal. xli. 3. Against poverty. "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them," Isa. xli. 17; Psal. lxxviii. 10. Against want of friends. "When my father and mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up," Psal. xxvii. 10; lxxii. 12. Against oppression and imprisonment. "Which executeth judgment for the oppressed: the Lord looseth the prisoners," Psal. cxlvi. 7. Against "whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness there be," 1 Kings viii. 37, 38. He is the God of "all consolation;" how disconsolate soever a man's condition is in any kind, there cannot but within the compass of "all consolation" be some one or other remedy at hand to comfort and relieve him. And so much by the way of general preface from the words of the context, which leads us to consider,

I. The invitation to repentance: in which we have, 1. The matter of the invitation. 2. The motives contained in the invitation.

1. The matter of the invitation is conversion: without that, the hand which is lifted up in threatening will fall down in punishing; and where that is, God has "a book of remembrance" for his jewels, when his wrath burneth as an oven against the stubble, Isa. xxvi. 11; Mal. iii. 16.

But this conversion has two conditions in it. 1. It must be to the Lord. "O Israel, return unto the Lord." Not merely philosophical, to some low and general dictates of reason, such as Aristotle, or Plato, or Epictetus, or Plutarch, or the like heathen moralists could furnish us with, without self-denial, lowliness of spirit, or * faith in Christ.

Not merely political, to credit, or profit, or secular ends, † propter famam, non propter conscientiam, as the orator speaks, or as our prophet saith, "for corn and wine," Hos. vii. 14. As good be an empty vine, as bring forth fruit only to ourselves, Hos. x. 1.

But it must be spiritual, to the Lord. "If thou wilt return, O Israel, saith the Lord, return unto me," Jer. iv. 1. And not only "unto the Lord," for that may be done falsely and flatteringly, with a halting and divided heart, Jer. iii. 10. By the force of semi-persuasions, like that of Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 28, and Orpah, Ruth i. 14, complimenting with God, and then forsaking him. By the force of compulsory impressions, like that of Pharaoh and Israel in the wilderness, Exod. viii. 8; ix. 27—34; Psal. lxxviii. 34—37. † Promises on the rack, and pride when there was respite again; thawing in the sun, and freezing in the shade; melting in the furnace, and out of it returning again to hardness; like the prophet's cake, burnt on the one side, and dough on the other. But it must be,

2. Even unto the Lord; so much the original word ἡ imports, a full, thorough, constant, continued conversion, with a fixed, rooted, united, established heart, yielding up the whole conscience and conversation to be ruled by God's will in all things, Joel ii. 12; Acts xi. 23; Psal. lvii. 7; Eph. iii. 17; Psal. lxxvi. 11; Heb. xiii. 9.

3. The motives to this duty are two. 1. His mercy: "Return unto the Lord thy God;" he is yet "thy God," no such argument for our turning to God as his turning to us. Adam looks on him as a judge, and hides; the prodigal looks on him as a father, and returns. As the beams of the sun shining on fire deadens its flame, so the shining of God's mercies on us should dishearten and extinguish our lusts. This is the use we should make of mercy. Say not, He is my God, therefore I may presume upon him; but, He is mine, therefore I must return to him. Because he is God, I will be afraid to provoke him; and because he is mine, I will be afraid to forfeit him. He is so great, I must not dare to offend him; so precious, I must not venture to lose him. His mercy is a holy mercy, which knows to pardon sin, but not to protect it. It is a sanctuary for the penitent, not for the presumptuous, Joel ii. 12, 13; Isa. lv. 6, 7; Jer. xxxi. 18; Hos. iii. 5; Psal. cxxx. 4; Acts ii. 38; Matt. iii. 2; Isa. lxiv. 9.

2. His judgment, and that expressed rather as our act than his: "Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity." If merits do not work upon love, let judgments work upon fear. Extremities are a warrant to importunities. Even heathen mariners in a storm will cry mightily upon God. When there is a deluge coming, is it not time for Noah to fear, and to prepare an ark? Heb. xi. 7. "What meanest thou, O thou sleeper," to lose the season and benefit of God's visitations? when there is a tempest over the ship, heavy distresses, and distractions both at home and abroad, to be so secure in thy wonted impendency, as if thou hadst had no sins to procure these judgments, or no sense to feel them, Jonah i. 6; as if there were agreements and sealed covenants between thee and the sword, that it should not touch thee? If thou be falling, is it not high time to consider thy ways; to search and to judge thyself; to have thine eyes like the windows of Solomon's temple, broad inwards; to find out thine own provocations, and, as David speaks, to keep thyself from thine iniquity? Psal. xviii. 23.

Επιστολὴ κακοβό-των ἐκφύρα τὸν
αὐτοῦ σταυρῶν.
Plat. de Sera.
Vindict.

Thus when in one and the same time mercies and judgments are intermixed, then is the most solemn season to call upon men for repentance. If we felt nothing but fears, they might make us despair; if nothing but mercies, they would make us secure. If the whole year were summer, the sap of the earth would be exhausted; if the whole were winter, it would be quite buried. The hammer breaks metal, and the fire melts it, and then you may cast it into any shape. Judgments break, mercies melt, and then, if ever, the soul is fit to be cast into God's mould. There is no figure in all the prophets more usual than this, to interweave mercies and judgments, like those elegancies which rhetoricians call δέξυμωρα, to allure, and to bring into a wilderness, Hos. ii. 14. And this of all other is the ἡμέρα κρισίμος, as physicians call it, the critical time of diseased people, wherein the chief conjecture lies, whether they be mending or ending, according to the use which they make of such interwoven mercies.

Vossius Rhetor. l. 5.
c. 12, sect. 7.

Vide Gorrui Definit.
Medic. et Laurent.

I have cursorily run over the first part of the context, the invitation to repentance, as intending to make my abode on the second.

II. The institution how to perform it. Therein we have, 1. A general instruction, "Take with you words." 2. A particular form, what words they should take, or a petition drawn to their hands, "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips. Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy."

1. A general instruction, "Take with you words." Of this I shall speak but briefly. It imports the serious pondering and choosing of requests to put up to God. The mother of Artaxerxes in Plutarch was wont to say, that they who would address themselves to princes, must use ὀήμασι βυσσίνους, silken words. Surely he that would approach to God, must consider, and look as well to his words as to his feet. He is so holy and jealous of his worship, that he expects there should be preparation in our accesses unto him, Josh. xxiv. 19; John iv. 23; Eccl. v. 1, 2; Gen. xxxv. 2, 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 5; Isa. i. 15, 16; preparation of our persons by purity of life, Job xi. 13; preparation of our services by choice of matter, Job ix. 14; Luke xv. 17, 18; preparation of our hearts by finding them out, stirring them up, fixing them, fetching them in, and calling together all that is within us to prevail with God, 2 Sam. vii. 27; Isa. lxiv. 7; Psal. lvii. 7, 8; ciii. 1; 2 Chron. xxx. 19.

Quantum a preceptis tantum ab auribus Dei longe su-sum. Tertul. de Orat. cap. 7.

The services which we thus prepare must be taken from him; they must not be the issues of our own private and fleshy hearts; for nothing can go to God, but that which comes from him. And this phrase seems to import these three things: 1. We must at-

l. 1. epist. 22. Nihil opinionis causâ, omnia conscientiæ, faciam. Senec. de Vita Beata, c. 20.

† Semisanciam hæc acce hac versare voluntatem. Aug. Confess. l. 8. c. 8. Plerique ipsius penitentia, &c. Ambro. de Premit. l. 2. c. 9. Ἐπαλλήλοισι ἐπι τοῖς ἀμαρτήμασι μετάνοια. Clem. Alex. l. 2. Strom. Irrisor est non penitens qui adhuc agit quod penitet, &c. Isidor. de Summo Bono. Senec. Ep. 120. Ambros. Offic. lib. 2. c. 22.

Ἄγασθ' ἢ τοῦ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην, καὶ οὐκ αἰσθῆναι
ἡλιθίως ἠθροῦτου.
Cicero. Alex. Stron.
lib. 6.

Dant animam ad loquendum libere vitæ miseræ.
Liv. lib. 29.
Imps sonatus aus
sibus humani ad populum et vota votis, &c. Liv. l. 3.
Alex. Stron. l. 6. c. 6.
p. 45. 3. Edit. Heins.
Sorum. l. 2. c. 6.
Præso. de Formul.
l. 1.
Aug. de Civ. Dei, l.
1. c. 33.

* Non sunt bona quæ non de radice bona procedunt. Ea ipsa opera quæ dicuntur ante fidem quamvis videantur hominibus laudabilia, inania sunt, ut magnæ vires et cursus celeritibus præter viam. Aug. Enarr. in Phal. 31. Vide de Spirit. et Lite, c. 20, 21, 26. Contra Duas Epist. Pelag. l. 3. c. 7. ep. 106. De Fide et Operibus, c. 14. Contra Julian. lib. 4. cap. 3.

† Nihil ad ostentationem, omnia ad conscientiam refert. Pl.

tend to his will, as the rule of our prayers, 1 John v. 14. 2. We must attend to his precepts and promises, as the matter of our prayers, 2 Sam. vii. 25. 3. We must attend to the guidance of his Holy Spirit, as the life and principle of our prayers, without which we know not what to ask, Rom. viii. 26; Zech. ii. 10; Job xxxvii. 19.

And prayers thus regulated are most reasonable and sovereign duties in times of trouble; the key which opens a door of mercy, the sluice which keeps out an inundation of judgments. Jacob wrestled and obtained a blessing, Hos. xii. 4. Amos prayed, and removed a curse, Amos vii. 1—6. The woman of Canaan will not be denied with a denial, Matt. xv. 24, 27. The people of Israel will beg for deliverance even when God had positively told them that he would deliver them no more, Judg. x. 13, 15. Jonah will venture a prayer from the bottom of the sea, when a double death had seized upon him, the belly of the deep, and the belly of the whale; and that prayer of his opened the doors of the leviathan, as the expression is, Job xli. 14, and made one of those deaths a deliverance from the other, Jonah ii.

Oh let the Lord's remembrancers give him no rest. There is a kind of omnipotency in prayer, as having an interest and prevalence with God's omnipotency; it has loosed iron chains, Acts xvi. 23, 26; it has opened iron gates, Acts xii. 5, 10; it has unlocked the windows of heaven, 1 Kings xviii. 41; it has broken the bars of death, John xi. 41—44. Satan has three titles given him in the Scripture, setting forth his malignity against the church of God. A dragon, to denote his malice, Rev. xii. 3; a serpent, to denote his subtlety, Gen. iii. 1; and a lion, to denote his strength, 1 Pet. v. 8. But none of all these can stand before prayer. The greatest malice, the malice of Haman, sinks under the prayer of Esther; the deepest policy, the counsel of Abithophel, withers before the prayer of David; the hugest army, an host of a thousand thousand Ethiopians, run away like cowards before the prayer of Asa, Esth. iv. 16; 2 Sam. xv. 31; 2 Chron. xiv. 9—12.

How should this encourage us to treasure up our prayers! to besiege the throne of grace with armies of supplications! to deny a denial! to break through a repulse! He has blessed those whom he had crippled, Gen. xxxii. 25—28; he has answered those whom he did reproach, Matt. xv. 26, 28; he has delivered those whom he did deny, Judg. x. 13—16. He is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8. If he save in six and in seven troubles, should not we pray in six and seven extremities? Job v. 19. Certainly, in all the afflictions of the church, when prayers are strongest mercies are nearest.

And therefore, let me humbly recommend to the cares of this honourable assembly, amongst all your other pressing affairs, the providing that those solemn days, wherein the united prayers of this whole kingdom should with strongest importunities stop the breaches and stand in the gaps at which judgments are ready to rush in upon us, may with more obedience and solemnity be observed, than indeed they have been of late. It is true, that here, and in other cities and populous places, there is haply less cause to complain. But who can without sorrow and shame behold in our country towns, men so inapprehensive either of their brethren's sufferings, or of their own sins and dangers, as to give God quite over, to let him rest, that they themselves may work; to come in truth to Jehoram's resolution, Why should we wait upon God any longer? to grudge their brethren's and their own souls and safeties one day in thirty, and to tell all the world that indeed their day's work is of more value with them than their day's worship? multitudes drudging and mowing in the earth, while their brethren are mourning and besieging heaven. I do but name it, and proceed to,

2. The particular form suggested to them, according to which their addresses unto God are to be regulated; which consists of two parts; 1. A prayer; 2. A promise. The prayer is for two benefits; 1. The removal of sin; 2. The conferring of good. In the promise or restitution, we have, 1. Their covenant, wherein they promise two things; 1. Thanksgiving for the hearing and answering of their prayers; 2. A special care for the amendment of their lives. 2. The ground of their confidence so to pray, and of their resolutions so to promise; "For in thee the fatherless findeth mercy." We shall now meditate on the first of these, The prayer of the church in their fears and sufferings; wherein I shall begin, in the prophet's order, with their prayer against sin, "Take away all iniquity."

The word תָּרַח rendered "take away," signifies, 1. To expiate, or make atonement by a sacrifice. So the scape goat (which was a sign of Christ our sacrifice as risen and living again) is said to carry the sins of the people into the wilderness, Lev. xvi. 22, thereby signifying Christ's taking our sins from us, John i. 29; Heb. ix. 28. 2. To forgive, which in the court of mercy is the taking away of sin, Psal. xxxii. 1, 5. 3. To remove or take away by destroying, Hos. i. 6; Job xxxii. 22; and sometimes by burning, 2 Sam. v. 21; Nah. i. 5: so sin is said to be destroyed, Rom. vi. 6, to be subdued, Micah vii. 19, to be purged away with the spirit of judgment and burning, Isa. iv. 4. The meaning then is, Take away all our sins from us, lay them upon Christ our sacrifice; for his merit pardon them, by his grace destroy and subdue them, that so, the root of judgments being removed, they likewise may therewithal be removed too. From hence the observation which I shall insist upon is this:

Obs. 1. When God threatens judgments, we in our conversion to him should pray against sins. Our eye of sorrow should be more upon that which dishonours him, than upon that which afflicts ourselves; more upon that which is contrary to his image, than upon that which is contrary to our own nature; more upon that which defiles, than upon that which pains us. Pharaoh cares for nothing but the removal of death, Exod. x. 17; Simon Magus for nothing but to have perdition and the gall of bitterness kept from him, Acts viii. 24; but good men, like wise physicians, cure the disease at the root, as Elisha did the waters by putting salt into the spring-head, 2 Kings ii. 21. The angel was smiting the people with a plague; David betakes himself to the right remedy, "Lo, I have sinned, and have done wickedly;" he goes not to the physicians, but to the altar to make atonement for sin, and so the plague was stayed, 2 Sam. xxiv. 17, 25. Destruction was threatened against Israel, for their calf, their murmurings, their rebellions; Moses stands in the breach to divert it, Psal. evi. 23; but how does he do it? surely by praying against their sins, Exod. xxxii. 31, 32; xxxiv. 9; Numb. xiv. 19. A sick man was brought to Christ to be healed, Matt. ix. 2; Christ overlooks the disease, and begins at the sin, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee;" and this being forgiven, the malignity of the disease was removed, though the matter should have remained. This was the usual method of David in his troubles, to throw over those Shebas that had wrought his woe. "Blot out," "wash thoroughly," "cleanse," "create," "renew:" he is far more importunate for pardon and purging, than for ease and comfort, Psal. xxv. 18; xxxii. 4, 5; xxxviii. 3, 4; li. Complaining in trouble is the work of a man, but repenting is the work of a Christian, Lam. iii. 39, 40.

Vid. Aug. Epist. 105.
Et Epist. 121. c. 65.

Vid. Justin Martyr, Apol. 2. Tertul.
Apolo. c. 5. 39, 40.
Eras. Scapulam. c. 4.

The reasons of this point are these three. 1. If a judgment should be removed while sin remains, it is not removed in mercy, but in anger; for many times God gives over punishing in displeasure, as a man throws away the rod when his scholar is incorrigible. "Why should ye be stricken any more? ye will revolt more and more," Isa. i. 5. If men be settled on their lees, and will not be reclaimed, there cannot a heavier punishment light upon them, than to be without punishment, to be left to themselves, and the fury of their own wills, speedily to work out their own perdition; that their own pleasures may become their plagues, and the liberty of their own lusts their sorest bondage, Hos. iv. 14; Psal. lxxxii. 11, 12; Ezek. xxiv. 13; Rom. i. 24, 28; Rev. xxii. 11.* God may take away in wrath that which he sent in anger, Hos. xiii. 11; as on the other side he may punish sin then when he forgives it, and may visit iniquity with rods then when he will not utterly take away his loving-kindness from a people, Psal. lxxxix. 32, 33; xcix. 8.

2. If a judgment be removed, so long as sin remains it is gone cum animo revertendi, either the same or a worse is likely to succeed, for God will overcome when he is judged, Rom. iii. 4. Pharaoh's stubbornness did not but increase his plagues. God will not endure that the pride of man should outvie his justice, Exod. ix. 17. If we do not take Christ's warning to go and "sin no more," we have great cause to fear his inference, that "a worse thing" will come unto us, John v. 14. If we do yet exalt ourselves, God will yet plead with us, Jer. ii. 9. If we will walk contrary to him, he threatens to do the like unto us, and to punish us seven times more for our sins, Lev. xxvi. 18—28. If we do not turn to him that smites us, then "his anger" in smiting shall not be "turned away, but his hand is stretched out still," Isa. ix. 12. God can bring clouds after rain, distresses in Ireland after distractions in Scotland, and distractions in England after distresses in Ireland, mischief upon mischief, and counsel against counsel, Manasseh against Ephraim, and Ephraim against Manasseh, to vex and weary out a sinful people, till they pine away in their calamities.

3. Sin being removed, though the affliction should not be removed, yet it is sanctified and turned into good. Repentance, like the philosopher's stone, can turn iron into gold, can make afflictions golden. So "the trial of your faith," that is, your affliction, is said to be "much more precious than of gold that perisheth," 1 Pet. i. 7. Whereas sin remaining is like coppers, which will turn wine or milk into ink. It converts the blessings of God into the provisions of lusts; cankers learning with pride, wit with profaneness, and wealth with luxury; like leaven, which turns a very passover into pollutions. As the pearl, which is an ornament to the woman who wears it, is a disease to the fish which breeds it; as the same perfume which refreshes a dove, is mortal to a vulture; as the same pillar and cloud was light to Israel, but dark to Egypt; the same deep a path to Israel, but a grave to Egypt; so the same blessings which by grace are converted into comforts, by sin are abused into dishonourable services, Hag. ii. 13. Sweet powders can make leather an ornament, when the sanies of a plague-sore will render a robe infectious. As it was said of Naaman, he was "a great man," an "honourable" man, "a mighty man in valour, but he was a leper," 2 Kings v. 1; so whatever other ornaments a man has, sin stains them with the foulest but that can be brought to deprave the fairest endowments. A learned man, a wealthy man, a wise man, an honourable man, but a wicked man. This makes all those other good things tributary to Satan.

Athe. l. 3. c. 13.

And therefore as the gold and silver of the Canaanites was to pass through the fire before it could be used by Israel, Numb. xxxi. 22, 23; so all other blessings bestowed on men must be "purged by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning," through the purifying waters of repentance, before they can bring honour to their author, or comfort to their enjoyer.

When Christ overcomes Satan, "he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils," Luke xi. 22. How does he divide the spoils? Surely he makes use of that wit, wealth, power, learning, wisdom, influence, which Satan used against Christ's kingdom, as instruments and ornaments to the gospel: as when a magazine in war is taken, the general makes use of those arms which were provided against him, for his own service.

And as sin thus corrupts blessings, so on the other side repentance sweetens judgments, and cau turn afflictions into matter of comfort. As scarlet pulls out the teeth of a serpent, so this takes away the sting of a judgment. As wine draws a nourishing virtue from the flesh of vipers; as hot birds can feed upon iron, and purge their bodies by swallowing stones; so repentance, though it should not remove a judgment, yet it can feed upon it, and fetch meat out of the eater, and out of the strong sweetness, Judg. xiv. 14.

There are two evils in afflictions. They are a thorn in the flesh, as they are matter of pain, and a snare to the conscience, as they are matter of temptation; as there are two things in a chain or fetter, the heaviness whereby it loads, and the hardness whereby it galls, Isa. viii. 21; 2 Chron. xxviii. 22; Rev. xvi. 10, 11. Now as a prisoner, though he cannot make his chain lighter, yet, by lining it with wool or other soft things, he can prevent the galling; so repentance, though it take not away the pain of affliction from the flesh, yet by humbling the soul to bear meekly, with silence and quietness, the indignation of the Lord, and accept of the punishment of sin, Micah vii. 9; Lev. xxvi. 41; Jer. x. 19, it removes the temptation and malignity of it from the conscience. And thus as Protagoras by his natural dexterity ordered the burden which he was to bear with more ease and advantage; so piety makes judgments, by spiritual prudence, more easy to be borne, and the light yoke of Christ, as bladders in a deep water, bears up the spirit of men from sinking, and lightens every other burden. And therefore as he in Plutarch said of the Scythians, that though they had no music nor vines amongst them, yet they had gods; so whatever other things may be wanting to a people, yet if God be their God, they are not destitute of any happiness. Yea, as those roses are usually sweetest which grow nearest to ungrateful weeds; so the comforts of God's Spirit are strongest when a man is otherwise perplexed. It was promised to Josiah, that he should die in peace, and yet we find that he was slain in war, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 28; xxxv. 24. His weeping and humiliation altered the very nature of trouble, and made war to be peace to him.

A. Gal. l. 5. c. 3.

Plut. de Sanitate tuend.

Now for the use and application of this point: this serves,

1. To instruct us how to deprecate calamities when God shakes his rod over us. There is nothing in all the world that God is in Psal. xxi. Magna ira est quando peccantibus non irascitur Deus. Hieron. Ep. 33. O servum illum beatum cuius emendationi Deus instat, cui dignatur irasci, &c. Tertul. de Patient. cap. 11.

* Exaudit propitius, non exaudit iratus: et rursus non exaudit propitius, exaudit iratus. — non parcat propitius, parcat iratus. Aug. contra Julian, lib. 5. cap. 4. Ad utilitatem quosdam non exaudis, ad damnationem quosdam exaudis. Id.

Τείχεα ἀγλάας φερέτω κοίλας ἐπὶ νῆας. Ηομ. II.
11.
Qui se debebant
arma tradebant.
Caes. de Bello Gal-lico, lib. 3.

Plat. de Audiend.
Poetis.

index et severus.
Ar. Tertul. contra Marcion. l. 2. c. 11,
14.

angry with but sin; for all other things are his own works, in the goodness of which he rested with singular placency and delight. Sin is that against which God's arrows are directed; and as the arrow sticks in the butt to which the mark is fastened, so the judgments which are shot at sin must needs light upon us to whom sin cleaves. The way then to divert the arrow is to remove the mark. God does indeed sometimes bring afflictions, without respect to the provocations of sin, upon his best servants: as if a man should shape out of a mass of gold some excellent vessel, though the gold be never so pure, yet it must pass through the fire and the hammer again. But it is certain too, that no affliction comes in anger but with respect to sin. And the anger of God is the bitterest thing in any calamity.

Now to divert this, there is no way but to get sin removed. Take the bark from a tree, and the sap can never find its way to the boughs. Sin is the vehiculum which carries shame and sorrow to the soul. Take away that, and a judgment has no commission. You may find an error in it, if you be not the same men that you were when it issued forth, for God shoots no arrows to hurt the body of his Son. Job indeed complains that God's arrows were within him, Job vi. 4,

Verberat et laeant, non est sœvitas, certamen est. Senec.
de Prov. c. 4.
Tentationibus non vincitur filius, sed probitus. Cyr. de Mort. Aug. de Civ.
Dei, lib. 1. cap. 29, 30, lib. 4. cap. 3.

but these were not for destruction, but for trial; as men shoot bullets against armour of proof, not to injure, but to test it. Job in this case was brought forth, not as a malefactor to suffer, but as a champion to triumph. Let a man take what course he can to keep off God's judgments, and hide himself in the closest protection that human power or policy can contrive; so long as he keeps his sin with him, God's arrows will get through at one joint or other, 1 Kings xxii. 34. A naked man with innocency, is better armed than Goliath in brass or iron.

We are apt in our distress to howl and repine, to gnaw our tongues and tear our flesh in the anguish of our sufferings; like the silly hart, which runs mourning and bleeding, but never thinks of getting out the fatal dart that sticks in its side. We look upward, to see whether help will drop into our mouths; and we look downward, to see whether human succours will avail us, Isa. viii. 21, 22; but we look not each inward, to find out "every man the plague of his own heart," that we may be rid of that, 1 Kings viii. 38: and till this be done, sin as naturally draws and sucks judgments to it, as the loadstone does iron, or turpentine fire. Indefatigable have been the pains of this high court, to make up the breaches that threaten us, and to heal the land. Whence comes it that our distractions remain unremoved? Certainly our leaks are not stopped, our sins are not thrown away; we labour at the pump to get the water out, but we do not take care to cure the passage at which it enters in: we are old bottles still, and God will not "put new wine into old bottles," Matt. ix. 17. If men would spend their murmurings and reproaches rather upon their sin than upon their physicians, the work would be sooner done. When the temple of God was to be new built, and a public restitution of the face of things to glory and splendour was in agitation, the prophets call upon God's people then especially to repent, Hag. i. 7; Zech. i. 3. Impenitency puts obstructions to God's mercy, and to all noble enterprises. So long as our lives are as bad as before, how can we expect that our condition should be better? in that case mercies themselves become no mercies; as, in the case of repentance, judgments would be no judgments. If we turn from our evil ways, God has engaged himself by a solemn promise, that he will do us "no hurt," Jer. xxv. 6. Otherwise to busy ourselves in outward ceremonies of repentance, bodily fasting, and verbal praying, is indeed but to flatter God, and, if we could, to deceive him. And God will answer such men not according to the prayer of their lips, but according to the idol of their hearts, Ezek. xiv. 4, 5.

2. This teaches us how to pray against sin. It must be against all, and in all respects. In the Hebrew text there is a kind of unusual transposition of the words, כל-חטאתו, the word for "all" is first. Methinks it intenuates an intendment of the church upon that point, to have, if it were possible, all sin taken away at the very first. If there be one leak in a ship, one gap in a wall, one gate in a city unprovided for; it is enough to sink a ship, to drown a country, to betray a city. One little boy thrust in at a window, can unlock the door for all the rest of the thieves. It was but one Jonah that raised a tempest, but one Achan that troubled a camp, and one sin generally unrepented of were enough to undo a kingdom. Do not say it is a little one, and my soul shall live. Even the philosopher tells us, that sometimes ἀνύμματα ἀλάχιστα are μεγίστα, the smallest errors prove most dangerous. How little soever it be in its own nature, it becomes heinous by thy allowance. It is as much treason to coin pence as twenty-shilling pieces, because the royal authority is as much violated by the one as the other.

Arist. Rhét. l. 1. Et Polit. lib. 5. cap. 8.

This then we must first and principally remember, to set ourselves against all sin. In confession none to be dissembled, in supplication none to be excepted, in conversion none to be reserved; never give it over so long as any is left. O Lord, yet it works, yet it lives, yet it tempts, yet it pains me. Sin has not done accusing me, let not thy mercy have done forgiving my sin. Sin has not done rebelling in me, let not thy grace have done subduing my sin. When men kill snakes or vipers, so long as they see them pant, or attempt to thrust out a sting, they strike them. Sin, like the thief on the cross, when it is first nailed and kept from its old tyranny, yet will, as much as it can, revile, and spit out venom upon Christ. O, therefore, give it not over, break its legs, crucify it clean through, till it be quite dead. None can pray or turn to God in truth, or hope to be delivered from judgments in mercy, so long as he holds fast any known sin. Can any man look to receive benefit by the blood of Christ, who hugs the monster that shed it? Is it not treason knowingly to harbour and entertain a traitor? Whosoever loves and holds fast sin, lies to God in every prayer that he makes.

This serves to reprove and bumble us for our hypocrisy and halvings with God in our conversions from sin, and confessions of it: we are willing to pray for the pardon of them all, we would have none hurt us; but when it comes to parting, and taking all away, this we cannot away with. Some are fat, delicate, golden sins; we would fain spare these, as Saul did Agag, and hide them, as Achan did his wedge, 1 Sam. xv. 9; Josh. vii. 21. Herod hears John gladly in many things, but if he restrain him from his Herodias, he must expect to be himself restrained, Mark vi. 20. Agrippa will be almost a Christian, but altogether may chance to bring a chain with it, Acts xxvi. 28. Jehu will down with Baal and his priests, but he knows not how to part with his calves, lest he venture his kingdom, 2 Kings x. 30, 31. Policy is ever entering caveats against piety. Thus men stand bartering with Christ in the bargain of salvation, not considering that the purchase of heaven is like the buying of the sibyl's prophecy, the longer we stand off, the dearer every day it will cost us; the more tears, the harder repentance, the deeper sorrow, the stronger cries. These men know not the price of a soul, nor the worth of a Saviour.

Oh, if Christ should have served us so in dying for sin, as many of us serve him in turning from sin, what a condition had our souls been in! If he had died for some sins, and not for others; if he had been as unwilling to "save" us "to the uttermost," as we are to serve him to the uttermost; if he had stopped before he came to "It is finished," and left any one drop of that bitter cup for us to drink after him, would it not have caused our belly to swell, and our thigh to rot, and made us for ever incapable of any other mercy than only a less damnation? Numb. v. 21.

Well, beloved, Christ expects, that as he died for all sin, so we should die to all. He will be counted "worthy of all acceptation," before he will bestow himself, 1 Tim. i. 15. He will not suffer his blood and his mercy to mingle with sin, or to be a protection to it: he cannot endure mingling of the holy seed with the profane; swearing by the Lord, and swearing by Malcham, Zeph. i. 5; Samaritan services, to be for the Lord in one thing, and for the world and flesh in another, one step straight, and another crooked, 2 Kings xvii. 33; one speech Ashdod, and another Canaan, Neh. xiii. 24; to let our conversation be yea and nay, a mongrel service. In this I will do as you bid me, but in that I will not; like the Jews that would buy Christ's blood with money, but not take the money into the treasury; they were fearful to defile their chests, but not to defile their consciences; this Christ cannot away with. It is dangerous to say with the Pharisee, This I am not, and that I am not, Luke xviii.

Altenae inter cupiditatem nostram et pavorem vices sunt. Senec. de Otio Sap. cap. 27. Maximum iudicium male meritis. Boetius. Ep. 150. Vir bonus dicitur. Aristot. Ethic. l. 2. cap. 45. τερπύρονος. Id. l. 1. c. 10. Νοθήνητος τὸ βέβαιον οὐκ ἐκείνη. Id. l. 8. c. 5.

11; or with the young man, This and that I have done, and in the mean time to have one thing lacking, to have one door locked up still to keep Christ and salvation from us, Mark x. 20. Whosoever keeps a covetous heart for the world, or a sensual heart for the flesh, or a proud heart for the devil, is unworthy of heaven by his own election, and would not go in thither if the door were wide open: he would not find there any fuel for these lusts, any Nabal, or Cosbi, or Diotrophes, with whom to converse. And surely he that allows himself in any one wickedness is, in God's construction, habitually guilty of all, James ii. 10; Luke xvi. 10; Ezek. xviii. 10-13.

Therefore in this case, as Samuel said to Jesse, "Are here all thy children?" if any be left "we will not sit down till he come hither," 1 Sam. xvi. 11; so we must conceive in our confessions and renunciations of sin, that Christ asks us, "Are here all?" if any be reserved, I will not take possession till that be cast out: there must not "an hoof" be left in Egypt, if God be to be served, Exod. x. 26. God's law, as well as man's, disallows inmates in the same house: he will not endure "a double heart;" he is "heir of all things," there lies no writ of partition in his inheritance; his title is so good that he will never yield to a composition; he will have all the heart, or none, Psal. xii. 2; James i. 8; Psal. cxix. 104, 128.

4. We should therefore be exhorted (in time of trouble especially) to set about this great work, to fall foul of our sins; to complain against them to God, as the Achans that trouble Israel, as the corrupters and betrayers of our peace; to set ourselves in God's eye, and not to dare to lie to his Holy Spirit, by falseness or hypocrisy, as if we could reserve any one sin unmortified which he should not know of; but being in his sight to whom "all things are naked and opened," to deal in all sincerity, and to hate sin even as he hates it, Heb. iv. 13; Gen. xvii. 1; 2 Cor. ii. 17.

"Take away all iniquity." There are five notable duties to which these words lead us.

1. Sense of sin, as "an heavy burden," as the prophet David calls it, Psal. xxxviii. 4. Such sense our Saviour requires in true penitents, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden," Matt. xi. 28. To conceive them heavier than "a millstone," Luke xvii. 2; than the weight of "mountains," Luke xxiii. 30. What apprehension had Peter's converts of sin, when they felt the nails wherewith they had crucified Christ sticking fast in their own hearts, and piercing their spirits with torment and horror! Acts ii. 37. What apprehensions had the poor jailer of his sins, when he came as a prisoner before his own prisoners, springing in with monstrous amazement and consternation of spirit, beseeching them, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" Acts xvi. 29, 30.

Consider it in its nature: a universal bruise and sickness, like those diseases which physicians say are corruptio totius substantiæ, unsoundness from head to foot, when "the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint," Isa. i. 5, 6. And who does not feel such a universal languor to be a heavy burden? For a man that must needs labour, to have weights hung at his hands; that must needs walk, to have clogs fastened to his feet; how can he choose but cry out with the apostle, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Rom. vii. 24.

Consider it in the curse that belongs to it: "A roll" "written within and without" with "lamentations and mourning, and woe," Ezek. ii. 10.

Look outward, and behold a curse in the creature, vanity, emptiness, vexation, disappointment; every creature armed with a sting to revenge its Maker's quarrel.

Look inward, and behold a curse in the conscience, accusing, witnessing, condemning, halting to the tribunal of vengeance; first defiling with the allowance, and after terrifying with the remembrance, of sin.

Look upward, and behold a curse in the heavens, "the wrath of God" "revealed" from thence "against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," Rom. i. 18.

Look downward, and behold a curse in the earth; death ready to put a period to all the pleasures of sin, and like a trap-door to let down into hell, where nothing of sin will remain but the worm and the fire.

Look into the Scripture, and see the curse there described; an everlasting banishment from the glory of God's presence; an "everlasting destruction" by "the glory of his power," 2 Thess. i. 9; and the Lord showing the jealousy of his justice, the unsearchableness of his severity, the inconceivableness of his strength, the bottomless guilt and malignity of sin, in the "everlasting destruction" of ungodly men, and in their everlasting preservation to feel that destruction.

"Who knoweth the power of thine anger?" saith Moses; "even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath," Psal. xc. 11. It is impossible for the most trembling consciences, or the most jealous fears of a guilty heart, to look beyond the wrath of God, or to conceive too highly of it. As in peace of conscience, the mercy of God is revealed to believers "from faith to faith;" so in anguish of conscience, "the wrath of God is revealed" from fear to fear.

A timorous man can fancy vast and terrible fears, fire, sword, tempests, racks, furnaces, scalding lead, boiling pitch, running bell-metal, and being kept alive in all these to feel their torment. But these come far short of the wrath of God, for, 1. There are bounds set to the hurting power of a creature; the fire can burn, but it cannot drown; the serpent can sting, but he cannot tear in pieces. 2. The fears of the heart are bounded within those narrow apprehensions which itself can frame of the evil which may be done. But the wrath of God proceeds from an infinite justice, and is executed by an omnipotent and unbounded power, comprising all the terror of all other creatures (as the sun doth all other light) eminently and excessively in it. It burns, and drowns, and tears, and stings, and bruises, and consumes, and can make nature feel much more than reason is able to comprehend.

Anima in corpore erit non vivendi causa sed dolendi. Aug. de Civ. Dei. l. 13. c. 2. Prima mors animam noxentem punit a corpore, secunda noxentem retinet in corpore. Ibid. l. 21. c. 3.

Oh, if we could lay these things seriously to heart, (and yet these are but low expressions of that which cannot be expressed, and come as short of the truth itself as the picture of the sun in a table does of the greatness and brightness of it in its own orb,) should we not find it necessary to cry out, "Take away all iniquity?" This sickness out of my soul; this sword, this nail, this poisoned arrow, out of my heart; this dagger of Ehad out of my belly; this millstone, this mountain, from off my back; these stings and terrors, these flames and furies, out of my conscience? Lord, my wounds stink, my lips quiver, my knees tremble, my belly rots, I am feeble, and broken, and roar, and languish; thy wrath lies hard upon me, and thy waves go over my head.

Oh, if we had but a view of sin as it is in its native foulness, and did feel but a touch of that fury which God is ready to pour out upon it, this would stain all the pride of man, and sour all the pleasures of sin, and make a man as fearful to meddle with it, as a guilty woman with the bitter water which caused the curse, Numb. v. 21. Most true was that which Luther spake in this point; If a man could perfectly see his own evils, the sight thereof would be a perfect hell to him: and to this God will bring wicked men. "I will reprove thee, and set" thy doings "in order before thine eyes," Psal. l. 21. Make them take a view of their own hearts and lives, fuller of sins than the firmament of stars, or a furnace of sparks. "Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver."

2. Confession; for he that cries to have sin taken away, acknowledges that it lies upon him. A full confession, not of many, but of all sins, either actually committed, or habitually comprised in our body of sin. As he in the Comœdian said, that he had invited two guests to dinner, Philocrates and Philocrates, a single man, but a double eater; so, in examination of ourselves, we shall every one find sins enough in himself to denominate him a double and a treble sinner. A free confession; not as Pharaoh's, extorted upon the rack, nor as that of Judas, squeezed out with anguish and horror; but ingenious and penitent, arising from the purpose of a pious heart, that comes like water out of a spring, with a voluntary freeness, not like water out of a still, which is forced with fire.

3. Weariness and detestation of all sin; for we call not to have a thing removed till we be weary of it. Thus we are taught in the Scripture to be ashamed and confounded, to loathe and abhor, to judge and condemn ourselves, to throw sin away as a detestable thing, though it be a golden or silver sin. A spiritual judgment looks on all sin as filthy and stinking, scoweth a man to himself as a vessel full of dung, scum, excrements, and gives him no rest till he be thoroughly purged. For hatred is πρός τὰ γένη, against the whole kind of that which we hate, Psal. xiv. 3; xxxviii. 3; Ezek. vi. 9; xvi. 63; Isa. xxx. 22; 1 Cor. xi. 31.

4. An acknowledgment of our own impotency to remove sin from ourselves. We have no more power than a slave in chains has to get out of his bondage till another ransom him; than a dead body in a grave, till Christ raise it. Our iniquities take hold upon us and keep us down, that we cannot hearken or be subject to the will of God. If sin were not removed by a greater strength than our own, it would most certainly sink us into hell, Psal. xl. 12; Jer. vi. 10; Rom. v. 6, 8; vi. 23; viii. 7; Eph. ii. 1—5; 2 Cor. iii. 5.

5. An imploring of God's mercy and grace, that what we cannot do ourselves, he would be pleased to do for us. In works of art it is hard to build, but easy to destroy. But in works of sin, though our weakness is able to commit them, yet none but God's power is able to demolish them. None but Christ is strong enough to overcome "the strong man," Luke xi. 21. His person only has strength enough to bear the curse of sin; his sacrifice only merit enough to make expiation for sin; his grace only virtue enough to remove its pollution. Though we should take "nitre," and "much soap," our sin would remain "marked," Jer. ii. 22; but he comes "like a refiner's fire, and like fullers' soap," and can wash out all, Mal. iii. 2. His only business in coming into the world was, "that he might destroy the works of the devil," 1 John iii. 8.

Now the things for which we pray in this petition are these three. 1. Remission; that God would take away the condemnation of sin from us, by not imputing the guilt thereof to us, but would cause it to pass over on Christ, on whom he has laid the iniquities of his people, Isa. liii. 6; Rom. iv. 8. Such an expression the Holy Ghost uses, רַחֵם ה' אֱלֹהֵינוּ ה' Lord has caused thy sin to pass over from thee to Christ, 2 Sam. xii. 13; which being obtained, all other judgments are ipso facto removed too, so far as they import proper and vindictive punishment.

2. Sanctification; that the virtue of Christ's death, and the grace of his Spirit, may subdue the power of sin, and cleanse and strengthen our consciences against the commands of it, and temptations unto it, Heb. ix. 14; Micah vii. 19.

3. Continued renovation; that as in sanctification begun we have power against all kinds of sin, so by the continual supplies of the Holy Spirit we may have further power against all degrees and remainders of sin. That Christ would purify our sin unto death, as our sin did him, and not give over mortifying it, till his blood be revenged of it to the uttermost, and our souls delivered from it to the uttermost.

I shall conclude the first part of the petition with a short word of exhortation to this honourable assembly. Those things which God works in us and bestows upon us by his grace, he also requires of us by his command: sometimes he promises to turn us, sometimes he commands us to turn to him; sometimes he bids us put away sin, and sometimes he promises to take it away from us, Isa. i. 16; Ezek. xviii. 31; xxxvi. 26; Heb. viii. 10—12; in the one showing us what is our duty, and in the other where is our help. And as this latter consideration calls upon our faith to pray, so the former upon our obedience to work. I shall therefore (right honourables) humbly offer a double exhortation to all of you.

First, That every one of you would seriously endeavour to "take away all iniquity" from his own person. And to this there lies upon you a double obligation: one with relation to the safety of your own souls; for whatever other honour, wealth, wisdom, learning, interest a man has besides, if sin have the predominancy, they are but Satan's magazine, and that man his servant, to employ them against God that gave them; and the more mercies wherewith any man has been trusted, the heavier judgment will be poured out upon the breach of that trust. Better be a wooden vessel to hold wine, than a silver vessel to hold excrements; better be a beggar with the treasure of God's grace, than a prince with the load of a man's own sins.

Facile est momento, quo quis vult, eadere possessione magna fortuna: facere et parare eam difficile atque arduum. Liv. 2. 24. Corps inutile augescunt, cito extinguuntur. Tacit. Vit. Agric.

Lex jubet, gratia juvat. Aug. Epist. 56.

But there is a further tie upon you, with relation to the success of that honourable employment whereunto you are called. Ita nati estis, ut bona malaque, vestra ad rempublicam pertinent. God will be sanctified in all those that draw near to him, as well in civil as in sacred administrations. It is very hard for a person in whom sin rules, to be constantly faithful to any public and honourable service; for grace only establishes the heart, Heb. xiii. 9. Aithophel, a man of great wisdom, falls from David; Joab, a man of great valour, falls from Solomon. And admit he be faithful, yet the sin of his heart sends out a prohibition to the wisdom of his head and the labour of his hand: he that will be a fit vessel for his Master's uses, must first of all "purge himself," 2 Tim. ii. 21; as we first cleanse a vessel before we use it. When Joshua was to negotiate a public reformation, and to administer a public service, his "filthy garments" must be taken from him, and he must be clothed with "change of raiment," Zech. iii. 4. Let every one of you make his public service one argument more than he had before for his necessary reformation, and let the piety of your lives bear witness to the integrity of your honourable undertakings.

Secondly, As you must take away sin from yourselves, so make it your principal work to "take away all iniquity" out of the land. Liberty, property, privileges are sacred and precious things, not to be in the least manner betrayed; yea, in some sense we may look upon them, as the Jews upon their Massora, tanquam legis et pietatis septem, as a fence and mound to religion itself. Arbitrary government would quickly be tampering in sacred things, because corruption in the church is marvellously subservient and advantageous to corruption in the state. But the most orient pearl of this kingdom is our religion, and the bitterest enemies to that are our sins. These are the snuffs that dim our candlestick, and threaten its removal; these the leaven that defile our passovers, and urge God to pass away and depart from us; these the obstructions between his sacred Majesty and you, and between both and the happiness of the kingdom. Think seriously what ways may be most effectual to purge this leaven out of the land. The principal sacrificial knife which kills and mortifies sin, is the knowledge of the word of God. It would have been a great unhappiness to the commonwealth of learning, if Caligula had (as he endeavoured) deprived the world of the writings of Homer, Virgil, and Livy. But oh, what an Egyptian calamity is it to have, in this sunshine of the gospel, thousands of persons and families (as I doubt not but upon inquiry it would appear) without the writings of the prophets and apostles! a Christian soldier without his sword, a Christian builder without his rule and square, a Christian calling without the instruments and balances of the sanctuary belonging to it. Oh that every parish, therefore, had an endowment fit for a learned, laborious, and worthy pastor, and pastors worthy of such endowments, that provision were made that every family might have a Bible in it, and (if by law it might possibly be procured) the exercises of religion therewithal! this would be the surest magazine to secure the happiness of a kingdom: that all reproachful titles, which the devil uses as scarecrows to keep back numbers from pressing in upon Christ's kingdom, were by law proscribed; that scandalous sins were by the awfulness and severity of discipline more blasted and brought to shame; that the Lord's house were more frequented, and his day more sanctified, and his ordinances more revered, and his ministers, which "teach the good knowledge of the Lord," more encouraged; in one word, that all the several fountains of the commonwealth were settled in a sound and flourishing constitution: that in every place we might see piety the elm to every other vine, the supporter to every other profession; learning adorned with piety, and law administered with piety, and counsels managed with piety, and trade regulated with piety, and the plough followed with piety: that when ministers fight against sin, with the sword of God's word, you who are the nobles and gentry of the land would second them, and frown upon it too; a frown of yours may sometimes do as much service to Christ, as a sermon of ours; and he cannot but take it very unkindly from you, if you will not bestow your countenance on him who bestroved his blood on you: that you would let the strictness of your lives, and the piety of your examples, put wickedness out of countenance, and make it appear (as indeed it is) a base and a sordid thing.

Sueton. in Calig. cap. 34.

If we would thus, in serious earnest, set ourselves against the sins of the land, no power, no malice, no policies, should stand between us and God's mercies; religion would flourish, and peace would settle, and trade would revive, and the hearts of men would be reunited, and the church be as a city compacted, and this nation would continue to be, as it has been, like the garden of Eden, a mirror of prosperity and happiness to other people; and God would prevent us, in the second part of our petition, with the blessing of goodness; as soon as ever iniquity were removed, he would do us good, which is the second thing here directed to be prayed for.

"And receive us graciously." וקח-שנים And take good, to wit, to bestow upon us; so taking is sometimes used for giving, thus: לקחת מניתי באדם "thou hast received gifts for men," Psal. lxxvii. 18, is by the apostle rendered και ἔλαβε ἑώρατα τοῖς ἀθρώποις, "and gave gifts unto men," Eph. iv. 8: and it is not improbable that the prophet here secretly leads us to Christ the Mediator, who first receives gifts from his Father, and then pours them forth upon his church, Acts ii. 33.

The meaning then is, Lord, when thou hast pardoned, weakened, mortified sin, go on with thy mercy, and being in Christ graciously reconciled to us, give further evidence of thy fatherly affection, by bestowing portions upon us. They shall not be cast away upon unthankful persons, we will "render the calves of our lips;" they shall not be bestowed upon those that need them not, or that know where else to provide themselves. It is true we have gone to the Assyrian, we have taken our horses instead of our prayers, and gone about to find out good; we have been so foolish as to think that the idols which have been beheld to our hands for any shape that is in them, could be instead of hands and of God unto us, to help us in our need: but now we know that "men of high degree are but a lie," that horses are but "a vain thing for safety," that "an idol is nothing," and therefore can give nothing, Psal. lxxii. 9; xxxiii. 17; 1 Cor. viii. 4: that power belongeth unto thee, none else can do it; that mercy belongeth unto thee, none else will do it; therefore since in thee only "the fatherless findeth mercy," be thou pleased to do us good.

We will consider the words, 1. Absolutely, as a single prayer by themselves. 2. Relatively, in their connexion, and with respect to the scope of the place.

1. Absolutely: and from such a consideration of the words we

Obs. 2. All the good we have is from God; he only must be sought unto for it; we have none in ourselves; "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing," Rom. vii. 18; we can neither think, nor speak, nor do it, Gen. vi. 5; 2 Cor. iii. 5; Matt. xii. 34; Psal. xiv. 3.

And missing it in ourselves, it is in vain to seek for it in things below ourselves.

They can provide for our back and belly, and yet not even that without God: the root out of which the fruits of the earth grow is above in heaven, the genealogy of corn and wine is resolved into God, Hos. ii. 21, 22. But if you go to your lands, or houses, or treasuries for physic for a sick soul or a guilty conscience, they will all return an ignoramus to that inquiry; salvation does not grow in the furrows of the field, neither are there in the earth to be found any mines or harvests of grace or comfort.

In God alone is "the fountain of life," Psal. xxxvi. 9; he that only "is good," he only "doeth good," Matt. xix. 17; Psal. cxix. 68: when we have wearied ourselves with having recourse to second causes, here at last, like the wandering dove, we must arrive for rest: "There be many that say, Who will show us any good? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us," Psal. liv. 6. From him alone comes "every good and every perfect gift," Jam. i. 17: whether temporal; it is his blessing that makes the creature able to comfort us, Prov. x. 2; Matt. iv. 4; 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5. The woman touched the hem of Christ's garment, but the virtue went not out of the garment, but out of Christ, Luke viii. 44. Or whether spiritual; sanctified faculties, 1 John v. 20; sanctified habits, Eph. ii. 8—10; Col. ii. 11, 12; sanctified motions, Phil. ii. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 25; glorious relations, in predestination, adoption, and Christian liberty, Eph. i. 5, 6; John i. 12; excellent gifts, heavenly comforts, all and only from him, 1 Cor. xii. 6; 2 Cor. i. 3; Rom. xv. 13: and that without change and alteration;

he does not do good one while, and evil another, but goodness is his proper and native operation; he is not the author of sin, that entered by the devil; he is not the author of death, that entered by sin; our destruction is of ourselves, Hos. xiii. 9. And therefore, though the prophet saith,

"Shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?" yet he does it not but only as it is bonum justitie, good in order to his own glory; for it is just with God, that they who run from the order of his commands, should fall under the order of his providence, and doing willingly what he forbids, should unwillingly suffer what he threatens.

In one word, God is the author of all good, by his grace working it; the permitter of all evil, by his patience enduring it; the orderer and disposer of both, by his mercy rewarding the one, by his justice revenging the other, and by his wisdom directing both to the ends of his eternal glory. This serves,

1. To discover the free and sole working of grace in our first conversion, and the continued working of grace in our further sanctification. Whatsoever is good in us habitually, as grace inhering, or actually, as grace working, is from him alone as its author. For though it be certain, that when we will and do ourselves are agents, yet it is still under and from him; Certum est nos facere cum factamus, sed ille facit ut faciamus, as the great champion of grace speaks; by grace we are that we are, we do what we do in God's service. Vessels have no wine, grapes have no money in them, but what the merchant puts in: the bowls of the candlesticks had no oil but that which dropped from the olive branches.

Things which seek no higher perfection than is to be found within the compass of their own nature, may by the guidance and activity of the same nature attain thereunto; but man, aspiring to a divine happiness, can never attain to it but by a divine strength: impossible it is for any man to enjoy God without God.

The truth of this point shows itself in five gradations:

1. By grace our minds are enlightened to know and believe him; for spiritual things "are spiritually discerned," Jer. xxxi. 33; Matt. xi. 27; 1 Cor. ii. 12—14.

2. By grace our hearts are inclined to love and obey him; for spiritual things are spiritually approved: he only, by his almighty and ineffable operation, worketh in us, et veras revelaciones, et bonas voluntates, both right perceptions and good desires, Jer. xxxiii. 39; John vi. 44.

3. By grace our lives are enabled to work what our hearts love; without which, though we should will, yet we cannot perform, no more than the knife which has a good edge is able actually to cut, till moved by the hand, Rom. vii. 18; Phil. ii. 13; Heb. xiii. 20, 21.

4. By grace our good works are carried on to perfection. Adam, wanting the grace of perseverance, fell from innocence itself. It is not sufficient for us that he prevent and excite us to will, that he co-operate and assist us to work, except he continually follow and supply us with a residue of spirit to perfect and finish what we set about. All our works are begun, continued, and ended in him, 1 Thess. v. 23; 1 Pet. v. 10; Jude 24; John xvii. 15.

Lastly, by grace our perseverance is crowned; for our best works could not endure the trial of justice, if God should enter into judgment with us, Psal. cxliii. 2; Isa. lxiv. 6. Grace enables us to work, and grace rewards us for working; grace begins and grace finishes both our faith and salvation, Phil. i. 6; Heb. xii. 2. The work of holiness is nothing but grace, and the reward of holiness is nothing but grace for grace.

2. To teach us how to know good from evil in ourselves. What we look on as good, we must see how we have derived it from God; the more recourse we have had to God by prayer, and faith, and study of his will, in the procurement of it, the more goodness we shall find in it. A thing done may be good in the substance of the work, and yet evil in the manner of doing it; as the substance of a vessel may be silver, but the use sordid. Jehu's zeal was rewarded as an act of justice, quoad substantiam operis, and it was punished too as an act of policy, quoad modum, for the perverse end, 2 Kings x. 30; Hos. i. 4. A thing which I see in the night may shine, and that shining proceed from nothing but rottenness. We must not measure ourselves by the matter of things done; for there may be malum opus in bonâ materiâ. Doeg prays, 1 Sam. xxii. 7, and Herod hears, Mark vi. 20, and hypocrites fast, Isa. lviii. 3; Matt. vi. 16, and Pharisees preach, Matt. xxiii. 2, 3; but when we would know the goodness of our works, look to the fountain, whether they proceed from the Father of lights, by the Spirit of love, and the grace of Christ, from humble, penitent, filial, heavenly dispositions: nothing will carry the soul unto God, but that which comes from him. Our communion with the Father and the Son, is the trial and foundation of all our goodness.

3. To abase us in our own eyes, and stain all the pride and cast down all the plumes of flesh and blood, when we seriously consider that in us, as now degenerated from our original, there is no good to be found. Our "silver is become dross," our "wine mixed with water," Isa. i. 22. As our Saviour saith of the devil, "When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh" εἰς τὸν ἑαυτοῦ, "of his own," John viii. 44; so when we do evil we work of our own, and κατὰ ἀνθρώπων, "as men," as the apostle speaks, 1 Cor. iii. 3. Our lusts are our own, James i. 14; our very members are of that body of sin which the apostle calls the "old man," with which it is impossible to do any good, as for a toad to spit cordials, Rom. vii. 23; Col. iii. 5; Eph. iv. 22.

Men are apt to glory in their good hearts and in-Concil. Milevit. can. 3, 4, 5. Concil. Arawic. secundum Aug. de Grat. c. li. lib. Arb. cap. 21.

Vid. Tertul. cont. Marcion. l. 2. c. 14.

Aug. de Grat. Christi, c. 25. cont. 2. Eph. 1. & c. 6. De Perfect. Justitiam, c. 19.

Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 12. c. 3.

Aug. lib. de Patientia, c. 18.

Vid. Aug. de Grat. Christi, l. 1. c. 13, 14. (c. 12.)

Aug. de Grat. Christi, c. 24.

Vid. Aug. Enchirid. c. 32. De Grat. c. li. lib. Arb. c. 6, et 17. Peto ut accipiam, et cum accipero rursum peto. Hieron. ad Ctesiphont.

Rebus ad ima tendentibus in imo positum fundamentum; ecclesia vero in imo posita tendit in celum, fundamentum ergo nominum sibi positum est. Aug. Enchirid. l. 1. in Paul. xxii.

tentions, only because they cannot search them, Jer. xvii. 9; and being carnal themselves, to entertain none but carnal notions of God's service. But if they knew the purity and jealousy of God, and their own impotency to answer so holy a will, they would lay their hands upon their mouths, and with Job "abhor themselves," Job xlii. 5, 6; and with Isaiah, bewail the uncleanness of their lips, Isa. vi. 5; and with Moses, fear and quake, as not being able "to endure that which was commanded," Heb. xii. 20; and with Joshua, acknowledge that they "cannot serve the Lord, for he is a holy God," Josh. xxiv. 19: they would then remember that the law of God is "a fiery law," Deut. xxxiii. 2, and the tribunal of God, a tribunal of fire, Ezek. i. 26—28; that the pleadings of God with sinners are "by fire and by the sword," and "his rebuke with flames of fire," Isa. lxvi. 15, 16; that the trial of all our works shall be "by fire," 1 Cor. iii. 13; that the God before whom we must appear is "a consuming fire," Heb. xii. 29. Go now and bring thy straw and stubble, thy drowsy and sluggish devotion, thy fickle and flattering repentance, thy formal and demure services, into the fire, to the law to measure them, to the Judge to censure them; nay, now carry them to thine own conscience, and tell me whether that will not pass the Father's verdict upon them.

Sordet in conspectu iudicis, quod fidei in conspectu operantis. Greg.

That which is fair in thine eye is filthy in God's.

4. For exhortation to these particular duties. 1. To patience and meekness under any evil that God may bring upon us; and that not barely because he does us good in other things, which was Job's argument, "What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" Job ii. 10; but further, because the very evils that come upon us are oftentimes by him intended for good, as Joseph told his brethren, Gen. l. 20. We are not angry with the physician when he lances, diets, and restrains us of our will: he denies us our will, that we may have our will; a sick man is many times more faithfully served when he is crossed. I lop my trees, bruise my grapes, grind my corn, to fit it to the ends whereunto it tends. God's end is merciful when his hand is heavy. As John's roll was sweet in the mouth, but bitter in the belly, Rev. x. 10; so troubles may be bitter to the palate, but profitable to the conscience; like hot spices, that bite the tongue, but comfort the stomach, Isa. xxvii. 9; xlviii. 10; Heb. xii. 11.

And as it dictates patience in suffering evil, so in doing our duties, though we suffer contempt and reproaches for it. If we were to receive our rewards from men, their frowns might discourage us; but when we have done God's will, God himself will be our reward, and make his promises our comfort. Moses and Aaron, though their whole employments were for the good of Israel, were yet repaid with murmuring and discontent, and the people, like children, qui cibum sumunt, sed stentes, (to use the similitude of the orator in Aristotle,) repined at the food which their prayers obtained for them; yet nothing dismayed them from their duty.

Etiam post naufragium tentantur maria.
The woman of Canaan prays on when she is denied, and Jacob holds with his hands when his thigh is lamed. Our first care must be to be in our way, to be doing our duties, and then, though (as Solomon speaks) we should meet a lion in our way, we must not be dismayed; for angels are stronger than lions, and he has given "his angels charge over" us, "to keep" us "in all" our "ways," Psal. xci. 11. Ye, whilst we are with him, he is with us, 2 Chron. xv. 1.

Rhetor. l. 2. c. 4.

Sen. ep. 81.

2 s

So that the way of the Lord is the surest and safest way for any man to walk in: "The way of the Lord is strength to the upright," Prov. x. 29.

2. To humility. If thou be a vessel of gold, and thy brother but of wood, be not high-minded, it is God that makes thee to differ; the more bounty God shows, the more humility he requires, 1 Cor. iv. 7; Rom. xi. 20. Those mines that are richest are deepest; those stars that are highest seem smallest; the goodliest buildings have the lowest foundations: the more God honours men, the more they should humble themselves; the more the fruit, the lower the branch on which it grows; pride is ever the companion of emptiness. Oh how full was the apostle, yet how low was his language of himself! "less than the least of all saints," "last" of apostles, "chief of sinners," no sufficiency to think, no abilities to do; all that he is, he is by grace: thus humility teaches us in our operations to draw strength from God, not from ourselves; in our graces to ascribe their goodness to God, and their weakness to ourselves, Eph. iii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 8; 2 Cor. iii. 5; 1 Tim. i. 15; Rom. vii. 18.

3. To dependence and continual recourse to God, as the fountain of all good; to keep an open and unobstructed passage between him and our soul. Say not, I have light enough in my house, I may now shut up my windows, for light within has dependence on immediate supplies from the sun without, and so has grace upon continual supplies from "the Sun of righteousness." God teaches even the husbandman to plough and thresh, Isa. xxviii. 26; in these things his direction is to be implored: meddle not then with great and high affairs without recourse to him; his name is Counsellor, and his testimonies are counsellors, let them be the rule and square of all your debates, Isa. ix. 6; Psal. cxix. 24. It is recorded for the honour of Scipio, that he went first to the Capitol, and then to the senate. But you have more noble examples. David is put to flight, he flees and prays, 2 Sam. xv. 26, 31; Hezekiah is at a stand in all his counsels, he sends to the prophet and prays, Isa. xlviii. 3, 4, 15; Jehoshaphat is in great distress, and knows not what in the world to do, but he prays, 2 Chron. xx. 6; Nehemiah is sore afraid, and hath a petition to make to the king, but first he makes one to God, and prays, Neh. ii. 3, 4. Whenever the children are come to the birth, and there is no strength to bring forth, all the world cannot furnish you with such another midwife as prayer, and recourse to God; it has delivered even graves of their dead. Therefore let me beseech you, whenever you meet with such difficulties as put you to a stand, that you know not what to advise or resolve upon, go to your closets, prostrate yourselves at His throne, whose honour it is to be seen in the mount; beg counsel of him "in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge." Let it appear that you seek his face to direct you, and his glory as the supreme end and design of all your consultations; and then try whether he be not a present help in trouble, and whether he will not magnify the wisdom of his counsel in the perplexity of yours.

4. To fidelity, in the use of any good which God bestows upon us; for God gives not talents to men barely to enrich men, but to employ them: therefore as the vessel has one passage to let the wine into itself, and another to pour it out into the flagon; so we should not only fill ourselves by dependence upon God, but should supply ourselves by love and service to our brethren.

Right Honourables, this nation has put into your hands all that is outwardly dear to them, their persons, posterities, liberties, estates. In these sad and woeful Opulentissima metalla quorum in alto latent venas. Sen. ep. 23.

Altissima flumina minimo sono labuntur. Q. Curt. l. 7.

Vid. Aug. de Grat. et lib. Arb. cap. 8.

Liv. lib. 26. A. Gel. l. 7. 1. Valer. Max. l. 1. c. 2.

Medicina etiam in vitiis prodest. Sen. ep. 86.
Que per insuavitatem medentur, emolumento curantibus officium sui excusant, et presentium injuriam superentem in ultimas gratias commendant. Tertul. de Penit. esp. 10.

distractions they look upon you as binders, and healers, and standers in the gap, and repairers of the waste places. God has called you to a high and a great trust; and the sad distempers of the church and state, the distresses and desolations of Ireland, the doubts, and fears, and convulsions of England, and in these two kingdoms the interest of all the protestant churches, call to you, like the man of Macedonia, in St. Paul's vision, "Come—and help us," Aets xvi. 9. Now in this great strait, when the children are come to the birth and there is no strength to bring forth, stir up the graces of God in you, call together all that is within you to call upon his name, improve the uttermost of your interests in him for the state of his church, manage every one of his gifts to the closing of those miserable breaches which threaten an inundation of calamity upon us all; wisdom, and learning, and piety, and prudence, are healing things. Remember (and oh that God would put into the hearts of this whole kingdom, from the throne to the plough, to remember) the fate of a divided kingdom from the mouth of truth itself. Oh that we would all remember, that misunderstandings, and jealousies, and divisions of heart, are a high evidence of God's displeasure, and that "through the wrath of the Lord of hosts is" a "land darkened," and, as it were, infatuated, when Manasseh is against Ephraim, and Ephraim against Manasseh, and every man eateth "the flesh of his own arm," Isa. ix. 19—21. Oh let us all remember what it cost Shechem and Abimelech, Judg. ix.; what it cost Benjamin, and the other tribes, even the loss of three-score and five thousand men, Judg. xx.: remember

Ἦ κεν γῆθησας Πρίμοιοι, Πρίμοιο τε παῖδες, Ἄλλοι τε Τρώες ἔμεν κεν ἄσπε-ροῖστο θυσιῶ.
 Πτομ. II. 2. 255.

Priam and his children will laugh, Babylon will clap their hands, and wag their head; no such time for Shishak, the Egyptian, to trouble Jerusalem, as when Israel is divided, 2 Chron. xii. 2. Let it never be said of God's own people, that they are fallen into the curse of Midianites, and Ammonites, and Edomites, and Philistines, to help forward the destruction of one another. Oh that God would give this whole nation hearts to consider these things, that he would put a spirit of peace and resolved unity into their minds, to be true to their own happiness, and by how much the greater are the subtleties of men to divide them, to be so much the more firmly united in prayers to God, and in concord between themselves; that they may not expose their persons, estates, posterity, and (which is dearest of all) their religion, to the crafty and bloody advantages of the enemies of the protestant churches, who in human view could have no way to overthrow them, but by their own dissensions!

Having thus spoken at large of the words of the prayer considered absolutely, we shall proceed to view them,

2. Relatively, in the scope and connexion of the prayer suggested to the judgment threatened. And here we would

Obs. 3. When temporal judgments are felt or feared, God's people should pray for spiritual mercies; human sorrows cannot overcome where the joy of the Lord is our strength. Thus the Lord seems to bonus qui non tri-but quod voluimus, ut tribuat quod malimum. Aug. ep. 34.

have taught his apostle; he was under some pressing discomfort, the messenger of Satan sent to buffet him, he prays for particular deliverance, and God answers him non ad voluntatem sed ad utilitatem, implying a direction to all such prayers, "My grace is sufficient for thee," 2 Cor. xii. 9. When thou feelest a thorn in thy flesh, pray for grace in thy heart; the buffets of Satan cannot hurt where the grace of God does suffice. So he directs us in time of plague and famine, to pray, and to seek his face, 2 Chron. vii. 14; to look more after his favour than our own ease; to be more solicitous for the recovery of his love than for the removal of his rod. This is a true character of a filial disposition. "In the way of thy judgments," even in that way wherein wicked men fling thee off, and give thee over, and quarrel with thee, and repine against thee, even "in the way of thy judgments have we waited for thee, and the desire of our soul is" more "to thy name" than to our own deliverance, Isa. xxvi. 8. True disciples follow Christ more for his doctrine than his loves, and are willing to choose rather affliction than iniquity, John vi. 26.

The grace and favour of God is "life," Psal. xxx. 5, "better than life," Psal. lxxii. 3, and therefore must needs be the most sovereign antidote to preserve and to bear up the soul above all other discomforts; whereas if he be angry, no other helps are able to relieve us. Brass and iron can fence me against a bullet or a sword, but if I were to be cast into a furnace of fire, it would help to torment me, if into a pit of water, it would help to sink me. Now our God is "a consuming fire," Heb. xii. 29, and his "breath like a stream of brimstone," Isa. xxx. 33. Human plasters can never cure the wounds which God makes; where he is the smiter, he must be the healer too, Hos. vi. 1. All the candles in a country are not able to make day there, till the sun come; and all the contents of the world are not able to make comfort to the soul, till "the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." In a mine, if a damp come, it is in vain to trust to your lights, they will burn blue and dim, and at last vanish; you must make haste to be drawn upward if you will be safe. When God sharpens an affliction with his displeasure, it is vain to trust to worldly succours; your desires and affections must be on "things above," if you will be relieved. There is no remedy, no refuge from God's anger, but to God's grace. Blood-letting is a cure for bleeding, and a burn a cure for a burn; and running in to God is the way to escape him, as to close and get in with him that would strike you is the way to avoid the blow. In a tempest at sea, it is very dangerous to strike to the shore, the safest way is to have sea room, and to keep in the main still: there is no landing against any tempest of God's judgments at any shore of worldly or carnal policies, but the way is to keep with him still; if he be with us in the ship, the winds and the sea will at last be rebuked.

Calores caloribus
 exorando depri-mimus et sanguinea fluxum defusa in-super venula revocamus. Tertul.

This then should serve to humble us for our carnal prayers in times of judgment, such as the hungry raven, or the dry and gaping earth, makes; when we "assemble" ourselves "for corn and wine," for peace and safety, and be in the mean time careless whether or no God receive us graciously. God much complains of it when he slew Israel; the rack made him roar, the rod made him flatter, but all was to be rid of affliction; it was the prayer of nature for ease, not of the spirit for grace, for "their heart was not right," Psal. lxxviii. 34—37. The like he complains of after the captivity: they fasted and prayed in the fifth month, (wherein the city and temple had been burned,) and in the seventh month, (wherein Gedeliah had been slain, and the remnant carried captive,) but they did it not out of sincerity toward God, but out of policy for themselves; and this he proves by their behaviour after their return. If you had indeed sought me, you would have remembered the words of the prophets when Jerusalem was inhabited before, and being returned, would now have put them to practice; but Jerusalem inhabited after the captivity is just like Jerusalem inhabited before the captivity: so that from hence it appears, that all their weeping and separating was not for pious, but politic reasons, Zech. vii. 4—7. And there is nothing under heaven more hateful, or more reproachful to God, than to make religion serve turns, to have piety lackey and dance attendance, and be a drudge and groom to private ends, to make it a cloak to policy, a varnish to rotten wood.

O then, when we weep and separate ourselves, let us not think to mock God with empty ceremonies of repentance, let us not assemble ourselves only to flatter away the rod from our back, and to get peace and security to our own persons, and then let the favour of God, the power of his grace, the comforts of his Spirit, be as unregarded as before; (as if we fasted and prayed only for our backs and bellies, not for our consciences or conversations;) for be we well assured, he who does not ask the things which he ought, shall not obtain the things which he asks: such a prayer begs nothing but a denial.

We have now many fasts together, we have prayed for making up our breaches, for repairing our ruins, for composing our distractions, for reducing this kingdom to a happy constitution, for a right understanding between the king and his great council. These prayers we have not found yet return, like Noah's dove, with an olive branch, a gracious answer to us again. What is the reason? Where is the obstruction? Is not he a God that heareth prayers? Is it not his title? Does he not glory in it? Certainly mercies stop not at God, but at us. We are not straitened in him, but straitened in our own bowels. If there come but a little light into a room, the defect is not in the sun, but in the narrowness of the window. If a vessel fill but slowly, the fault is not any emptiness in the fountain, but the smallness of the pipe. If mercies ripen slowly, or stop at any time in the way, it is not because they are unwilling to come to us, but because we are unfit to enjoy them. Our prayers, doubtless, in many cases, have not been words taken from the revealed mind of God, but from our carnal dictates.

We would fain have things well in our country, but have we hitherto looked after our consciences? The distractions without us, have they driven us to consider the distempers within, or to desire the things above? The unsettledness of peace in the kingdom, has it awakened us to secure our peace with God? We would fain have better times, but have we yet laboured for better hearts? We would fain have a right understanding between the king and his great council, but have we yet seriously set about having a more clear and sweet communion between us and our God? we long to see more good laws, but are we yet come to care for good lives? Every one cries out, "Who will show us any good?" but how few think on "the light of God's countenance!"

Hence, beloved, is the miscarriage of all our prayers. If we would "seek first the kingdom of God," we are promised other things by way of overplus and accession, as he that buys a treasury of jewels has the cabinet into the bargain. But when we place our kingdom in outward comforts, and let our "daily bread" shut all the other five petitions out of our prayers, no wonder if "the promise of this life," which is annexed to godliness, answers not those prayers wherein godliness is neglected. It were preposterous to begin the building of a house at the roof and not at the foundation. Piety is the foundation of prosperity. If you would have your sons as plants, and your daughters as polished corner-stones, your garners full, your cattle plenteous, no complaining in your streets, Psal. cxliv. 12—14; if you would have the king happy, and the church and the state happy, and peace and prosperity flourish again; let our chief prayer be, Lord, make us a happy people by being our God. Give us thyself, thy grace, thy favour, give us renewed hearts and reformed lives; let not our sins confute, and outcry, and belie our prayers, and pray them back again without an answer. And when we seek thee and thy Christ above all, we know that thou wilt "with him also freely give us all things." The spiritual good things which we beg, will either remove, or shelter and defend us from, the outward evil things which we suffer.

Further, this serves for an instruction to us touching a sanctified use of God's judgments, or threatenings. When we learn obedience (as Christ did) by the things which we suffer, Heb. v. 8; when παθηματα are μαθηματα, that we are chastened and taught together, Psal. xciv. 12; when sufferings quicken spiritual desires, and the more troubles we find in our way, the more love we have to our country; when we can say, "All this is come upon us, and yet have we not forgotten thee," Psal. xlv. 17, 18; when we can serve God as well in ploughing and breaking the clods, as in treading out the corn, Hos. x. 11; when with Jonah we can delight in him even in the whale's belly, and suffer not our love of him to be quenched with all the waters of the sea; when we can truly say to him, Lord, love me, and then do what thou wilt unto me, let me feel thy rod rather than forfeit thine affection; when we can look through the anger of his chastisements to the beauty of his commands and to the sweetness of his loving countenance, as by a rainbow we see the beautiful image of the sun's light in the midst of a dark and waterish cloud; when by how much the flesh is the fuller of pain, by so much prayers are fuller of spirit; by how much the heavier are our earthly sufferings, by so much the stronger are our heavenly desires: when God threatens punishments, and we pray for grace, this is a sanctified use of God's judgments. And this we should all be exhorted to in the times of distraction, to make it the principal argument of our prayers and study of our lives, to obtain spiritual good things; and the less comfort we find in the world to be the more importunate for the comforts of God, that by them we may encourage ourselves, as David did in his calamity at Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. 6. When the city Shechem was beaten down to the ground, then the men and women fled to the strong tower and shut that upon them, Judg. ix. 51. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe," Prov. xviii. 10. By thus striving for a sanctified use of God's judgments we shall,

1. More honour God, when we set him up in our hearts as our fear and treasure, and mourn more towards him than for the miseries we feel, and aspire more after him than all the outward contentment which we want.

2. More exercise repentance; for it is "the sorrow of the world" which droops under the pain of the flesh, but "godly sorrow" is most of all affected with the anger of God.

3. More prevail with God. The more heavenly the subjects of our prayer are, the more prevalent they must needs be with a heavenly Father; we have five spiritual petitions to the one for bread. The more suitable our prayers are to God's will, the more easy access they will have to his ear. The covenant of grace turns precepts into promises, and the spirit of grace turns precepts and promises into prayers. It is not God's will that we should live without afflictions, but our sanctification is God's will, 1 Thess. iv. 3. The more prayers proceed from love, the more acceptable to the God of love: now prayer against judgments proceeds from fear, but prayer for grace and favour proceeds from love.

4. Hereby we shall more benefit ourselves. God's grace is much better than our own ease; it gives us meekness to submit, it gives us strength to bear, it gives us wisdom to benefit by our afflictions.

Quisquid mihi preferri illam est, dulce non est; quicquid mihi vult dare Dignitas mea, au-ferat totum, et se

God's favour is much better than our own ease, and is a recompence for sufferings beyond all their evils. A man would be contented to be loaded with gold, so he might have it for the bearing, though it be heavy, yet it is precious; and God's favour turns affliction into gold. If he give quietness, nothing can give trouble, Job xxxiv. 29; and if he keep back his grace and favour, nothing can give peace; neither wealth, nor honours, nor pleasures, nor crowns, nor all the world, with the fulness, or rather the emptiness, thereof, none of them can do us any good. Any thing which will consist with the reign of lust, with the guilt of sin, with the curse of the law, with the wrath of God, with horrors of conscience, and with the damnation of hell, is too base to be called the good of man. "To do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God," this is bonum hominis, the good of man, Micah iv. 8; to "fear God, and keep his commandments," this is totum hominis, the whole end and happiness of man, Eccl. xii. 13.

O then get remission and removal of sin, get this bonum hominis, the oil of grace in your lamps, the peace of God in your hearts, the streams of the river of God in your consciences; and then, though the earth be moved, and the mountains shake, and the waters roar, whatever distractions, whatever desolations happen, impavidum ferient ruinae; thou shalt find a chamber in God's providence, a refuge in his promises, a pavilion in the secret of his presence, to protect and to comfort thee above them all.

Ver. 2, 3. — So will we render the calves of our lips. Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy.

In the whole context we have before observed two general parts, Israel's prayer, and Israel's promise. The prayer we have handled, and now proceed to,

II. The promise, wherein are two things to be considered: 1. The covenant itself. 2. The ground upon which they make it, God's mercy to the fatherless. First, then, of the covenant, wherein they promise two things: 1. Thanksgiving for God's hearing and answering of their prayers. 2. A special care for amendment of their lives.

"So will we render the calves of our lips." פריה שפתינו The apostle out of the Septuagint reads this, καρπὸν χιλιῶν, "the fruit of our lips," Heb. xiii. 15. It is the use of the Scripture to describe spiritual duties by expressions drawn from ceremonies and usages under the law; as repentance is called washing, Isa. i. 16; and prayer, "incense," Psal. cxli. 2; Rev. v. 8; and the righteousness of saints, "fine linen," in allusion to the garments of the priests, Rev. xix. 8; and Christ, "an altar," whereby both our persons and services are sanctified and accepted, Heb. xiii. 10; Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet.

Habeamus altare, viz. corpus Christi. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 5. cap. 4.

ii. 5; Isa. lvi. 7. Thus here, the spiritual sacrifices of praise are called "calves," to show the end of all sacrifices, which were ordained for the stirring up of spiritual affections and praises to God, and also to intimate the vanity of ceremonial without real services. The beast on the altar was but a carnal, but the faith of the heart and the confession of the mouth was a reasonable, sacrifice. No point more insisted on in the prophets than this, Isa. i. 15; Micah vi. 6—8; Amos iv. 4, 5; v. 21; Psal. l. 13—15; lxix. 30—36. They had idolatrously dishonoured God with their calves of Dan and Beth-el, and they had carnally and superstitiously placed all worship and holiness in the calves of the altar; but now they resolve to worship God neither politically, after human inventions, nor perfunctorily, with mere outward ceremonies, but spiritually, and from inward affections; for the lips are moved by the heart.

Now, thanksgiving is further called "the calves" or sacrifices "of our lips," to intimate, that after all God's rich mercies to us, in pardoning our sins, and in multiplying to us his grace and spiritual comforts, we, like beggars, have nothing to return but the bare acknowledgments and praises of our lips, words for wonders: and those words, too, his own gifts; we cannot render them to him before we have received them from him. Psal. cxvi. 12, 13; Matt. xii. 34; 1 Chron. xxix. 16.

"Asshur shall not save us." To the general confession of sin intimated in those words, "Take away all iniquity," there is added here a particular detestation of their special sins, with a covenant to forsake them, lest waxing wanton with pardon and grace, they should relapse into them again. The sum is to confess the vanity of carnal confidence, betaking itself to the aid of men, to the strength of horses, to the superstition of idols for safety and deliverance. All which they are now at last, by their experience and by their repentance, taught to abandon, as things which indeed cannot, and therefore they are resolved shall not, save them.

By the Assyrian is here intimated all human succour procured by sinful correspondence, by a synecdoche of the part for the whole. But he is particularly mentioned, 1. Because he was the chief monarch of the world, to show that the greatest worldly succours are vain, when they are relied upon without, or against, God. 2. Because the Scripture takes notice often of it as their particular sin, the sending unto, relying upon, and paying him tribute for aid and assistance, Hos. v. 13; vii. 11, 12; 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. 3. Because instead of helping, he did greatly afflict them. Their flying to him was like a bird's flying into a snare, or a fish's avoiding the pole wherewith the water is troubled, by swimming into the net, 2 Kings xv. 29; Hos. xiii. 4.

"We will not ride upon horses." By "horses" we are to understand the military preparations and provisions which they made for themselves, both at home and from Egypt, 2 Chron. i. 16; Isa. xxxi. 1.

"Neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods." By "the work of" their "hands" are meant their idols, which were indebted to their hands for any shape or beauty that was in them. The same hands which formed them were afterwards lifted up in worship to them, Isa. xlv. 10, 17; xlv. 6—8; Jer. x. 3, 15; Acts xix. 26. Time was when we said, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," Exod. xxxii. 4; 1 Kings xii. 28; but now we will not say so any more, for how can a man be the maker of his Maker?

"For in thee the fatherless findeth mercy." This is the ground of their petition for pardon and grace, and of their promise of praises and amendment, God's mercy in hearing the prayers, and in enabling the performances, of his people. It is a metaphor drawn from orphans in their minority, who are, 1. Destitute of wisdom and abilities to help themselves. 2. Exposed to violence and injuries. 3. Committed for that reason to the care of tutors and guardians to govern and protect them. The church here acknowledges herself an outcast, destitute of all wisdom and strength within, of all succour and support from without, and therefore betakes herself solely to God's tuition, whose mercy can and is wont to help when all other help fails.

This is the last link of that golden chain of repentance, made up of these gradations: 1. A humble address unto God. 2. A penitent confession of sin. 3. An earnest petition against it. 4. An imploring of grace and favour. 5. Thanksgiving for so great benefits. 6. A covenant of new obedience. And, lastly, A confidence and quiet repose in God.

Let us now consider what useful observations the words thus opened will afford. As we see that after they have petitioned for pardon and grace, they then restitute and undertake to perform duties of thankfulness and obedience, we would, in general,

Obs. 4. True penitents, in their conversion from sin, and humiliation for it, not only pray to God for mercy, out moreover covenant to express the fruits of those mercies in a thankful and obedient conversation. When first we are admitted into the family and household of God, we enter into a covenant. Therefore circumcision, whereby the children of the Jews were first sealed and separated for God, is called "my" God's "covenant" Gen. xvii. 4, because therein God did covenant to own them, and they did in the figure covenant to mortify lust, and to serve him, without which they were in his sight but uncircumcised still.

"Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will punish all them which are circumcised with the uncircumcised," על כרתי על כרתי upon all that are circumcised in uncircumcision, Jer. ix. 25. The nations joined in the following verse with Judah, who are said to be uncircumcised, did yet use circumcision, as the learned have observed; but being out of covenant with God, it is accounted to them as uncircumcision, so that of the Jews too when they broke covenant with God, Rom. ii. 28, 29; Acts vii. 51. And as the Gentiles being converted are called Jews, and said to be born in Zion, Psal. lxxxvii. 4, 5; Gal. vi. 16; 1 Cor. xii. 13; so the Jews living impatiently are called Gentiles, Canaanites, Amorites, Hittites, Ethiopians, Sodomites, Ezek. xvi. 3; Hos. xii. 7; Amos ix. 7; Isa. i. 10. In like manner baptism among Christians is called by the apostle συνέλιψις εἰς ὁδὸν, εἰς ὁδὸν, which the learned interpret the answer, or covenant, of keeping a good conscience towards God, 1 Pet. iii. 21. Ἐπίρωτημα, a question or interrogation, which some would have to be the conscience making interpellation for itself to God; others, to be as much as δοκιμασία, the examining of a man's self, like that before the Lord's supper, 1 Cor. xi. 28. I rather take it as an allusion to the manner of John's baptism, wherein the people first confessed, and consequently renounced, sin; and being taken into Christ's service, or into that kingdom of God which was at hand, inquired what work they were to do. And we find the same word in Luke iii. 10, "And the people" ἔπρωτων αὐτῶν, "asked him, saying, What shall we do then?" whereby is intimated, an engaging of themselves by a solemn promise and undertaking to the practice of that repentance unto which John baptized them. * Whence arose that grave form of the ancient churches, wherein questions were proposed to the person baptized touching his faith and repentance, renouncing the world, the flesh, and the devil, with a solemn answer and stipulation obliging thereunto. Which custom seems to have been derived from the practice used in the apostles' time, wherein profession of faith unfeigned, and sincere repentance, was made before baptism, Acts ii. 38; viii. 37; xvi. 33; xix. 4.

Visitabo super eos populus incircumcisus. Verso Circumcisus. Ἐπρωτων ἑστι παρὰ τὸν ἀπεριτομητων ἀποκρισας αὐτων, Septuag.

Herodot. l. 2. Artabanus apud Euseb. de Prep. ev. l. 9. c. 27. Orig. in Rom. l. 2. cap. 2.

Cameron, de Eccles. p. 34. Nec hoc novum Scripturis figurate aut translatione nominum, ex comparatione criminum, &c. Tertul. contr. Judaeos, c. 8. et cont. Marcion, l. 2. c. 8.

Quid est Dei veri renuncius jurato nisi promissi confirmatio, et infidelium quendam inceptio? Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 16. cap. 32.

* Aug. lib. de Fide et Operibus c. 9. Tertul. ad Mart. c. 2, et 3. et de Coron. Milit. c. 3, et 13. de Habitu. Mulieb. c. 2. de Spectaculo, c. 24. et lib. de Idolatria. Apol. c. 38. Interrogatio legitima et Ecclesiastica. Firmilian. apud Cyprian. ep. 75. et ib. ep. 70, et 76.

† Dignaris eis, quibus omnia debita dimittis, etiam promissionibus tuis debitor fieri. Aug. Conf. l. 5. c. 9. Non ei aliquid dedimus, et tenemus debitorem. Unde debitorum? quia promissor est. Non dicimus Deo, Domine redde quod accepisti, sed redde quod promissisti. Aug. in Psal. xxxii. Cum promissum Dei redditur justitia Dei dicitur. Justitia enim Dei

This is the first dedicating of ourselves, and entering into a covenant with God, which we may call, in the prophet's expression, the subscribing, or giving a man's name to God, Isa. xlv. 5.

Now the covenant between us and God being perpetual, "a covenant of salt," Jer. xxxii. 40; 2 Chron. xiii. 5. As we are to begin it in our baptism, so we are to continue it to our lives' end, and upon all fit occasions to repeat and renew it for our further quickening and remembrancing unto duties. So did David, Psal. cxix. 106; so Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 20—22; so Asa and the people in his time, 2 Chron. xv. 12, 13; so Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 10; xxx. 5, 23; so Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 31, 32; so Ezra and Nehemiah, Ezra x. 3; Neh. ix. 38.

The reasons enforcing this duty may be drawn from several considerations.

1. From God in Christ, where two strong obligations occur; 1. His dealing with us. 2. Our relation to him.

1. His dealing with us. He is pleased not only to enter into covenant with us, but to bind himself to the performance of what he promises. Though whatever he bestow upon us is all matter of mere and most free grace, wherein he is no debtor to us at all, yet he is pleased to bind himself to acts of grace. Men love to have all their works of favour free, and to reserve to themselves a power of alteration or revocation. But God is pleased that his gifts should take upon them in some sense the condition of debts; and although he can owe nothing to the creature, yet he is content to be a debtor to his own promise; and having at first in mercy made it, his truth is often engaged to the performance of it, Rom. xi. 35; Job xxii. 3; xxxv. 7, 8; Micah vii. 20.

Further, his word is established in heaven; with him there is no variableness, nor shadow of change; his promises are not yea and nay, but in Christ Amen, 2 Cor. i. 20; if he speak a thing it shall not fail, Josh. xxi. 45. He spake and the world was made; his word alone is a foundation and bottom to the being of all his creatures: and yet, notwithstanding the immutable certainty of his promises, when they are first uttered, for our sakes he is pleased to bind himself by further ties; free mercy secured by a covenant, and a firm covenant secured by an oath, Deut. vii. 12; Luke i. 72, 73; Heb. vi. 17, 18; that we, who, like Gideon, are apt to call for sign upon sign, and to stagger and be disheartened if we have not double security from God, we, whose doubting calls for promise upon promise, as our ignorance does for "precept upon precept," may, by "two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie—have a strong consolation." Now if God, whose gifts are free, bind himself to bestow them by his promise; if God, whose promises are sure, bind himself to perform them by his oath; how much more are we bound to tie ourselves by covenant to God, to do those things which are our duty to do, unto the doing whereof we have such infirm principles as a mutable will and an unsteadfast heart.

2. Our relation to him. We are his, not only by a property founded in his sovereign power and dominion over us, as our Maker, Lord, and Saviour, Psal. c. 3; 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20; but by a property growing out of our own est quia redditum est quod promissum est. Ambros. in Rom. iii. Justum est ut reddat quod debet. Debet autem quod pollicitus est. Et hoc est justitia de qua praesumit apostolus promissio Dei. Bern. de Gratia. et lib. Arbit. Licet Deus debitum alicui det, non tamen est ipse debitor, quia ipse ad alia non ordinatur, sed potius alia ad ipsum, et ideo justitia quandoque dicitur in Deo condecencia sua bonitatis. Aquin. part. 1. qu. 21. art. 1. Nulla alia in Deo justitia nisi ad se quasi ad alterum, ut sibi ipsi debitum reddat secundum condecencia bonitatis, et rectitudinem voluntatis suae. Scotus 4. dist. 46. qu. 1.

voluntary consent, whereby we surrender, and yield, and give up ourselves unto God, Rom. vi. 19; 2 Cor. viii. 4. We are not only his people, but his willing people, by the intervention of our own consent, Psal. cx. 3. We give him our hand; יָדֵינוּ יָתִיתִי לַיהוָה give your hand unto the Lord, "yield yourselves unto the Lord," 2 Chron. xxx. 8, an allusion to the manner of covenants or engagements, Prov. vi. 1; xvii. 18; Ezek.

Junge ergo manus, et concipe fœdus.
Statius.
Hæc tibi pacta dedit, commissaque dextra dextræ
Ovid.

xvii. 18. We offer up ourselves as a free oblation, Rom. xv. 16, and are thereupon called "a kind of first-fruits," James i. 18. We are his, as the wife is her husband's, Hos. ii. 19; Ezek. xvi. 8. Now such an interest as this ever presupposes a contract. As in ancient forms of stipulation there was asking and answering: Spondes? Spondeo. Promittis? Promitto. Dabis? Dabo. As in contract of marriage, the mutual consent is asked and given, Gen. xxiv. 68; so it is here between God and the soul, the covenant is mutual, Gen. xvii. 2. He promises mercy, to be our "exceeding great reward," and we promise obedience, to be his "willing people," and usually according as is the proportion of strength in our faith to believe God's promises of mercy to us, such is also the proportion of care in our obedience to perform our promises of duty to him.

2. From ourselves. And here covenants are needful in two respects. 1. In regard of the falseness and deceitfulness of our corrupt hearts in all spiritual duties. The more cunning a sophister is to evade an argument, the more close and pressing we frame it; the more vigilant a prisoner to make an escape, the stronger guard we keep upon him. Our hearts are exceeding apt to be false with God. One while they melt into promises and resolutions of obedience, as Pharaoh and Israel did, Psal. lxxviii. 34—37, and presently forget and harden again. Lot's wife goes out of Sodom for fear of the judgments, but quickly looks back again out of love to the place, or some other curiosity and distemper of mind. Saul relents towards David, and quickly after persecutes him again, 1 Sam. xxiv. 16—20; xxvi. 1, 2. This is the true picture of man's heart, under a strong conviction, or in a pang of devotion, or in time either of sickness, or some pressing affliction, on the rack, in the furnace, under the rod, nothing then but vows of better obedience; all which do oftentimes suddenly vanish as "the early dew," and wither away like Jonah's gourd. Therefore, both to acknowledge and prevent this miserable perfidiousness of such revolting hearts, it is very needful to bind them to God with renewed covenants; and since they are so apt with Jonah to run away and start aside, to neglect Nineveh and to flee to Tarshish, necessary it is to find them out and to bring them home, and, as David did, to fix and fasten them to their business, Psal. lvi. 7.

2. In regard of the sluggishness to duty natural to us. We are apt to faint and be weary when we meet with any unexpected difficulties in God's service, to esteem the wilderness as bad as Egypt; to sit down as Hagar did, and cry, to think that half way to heaven is far enough, and almost a Christian progress enough; that baking on one side will make the cake good enough; that God will accept of bankrupt payment, a noble in the pound, part of our hearts and duties for all. Now, to correct this torpor, this ἀλογονυχία, as the apostle calls it, 1 Thess. v. 14, this pusillanimity, and faint-heartedness in God's service, we must bind it on ourselves with renewed covenants, and put to the more strength because of the bluntness of the iron. Eccl. x. 10. A covenant does as it were twist the cords of the law, and double the precept upon the soul; when it is only a precept, then God alone commands it, but when I have made it a promise, then I command it and bind it upon myself. The more feeble our hands and knees are, the more care we should have to bind and strengthen them, that we may lift them up speedily, and keep them straight, Heb. xii. 12, 13; and the way to effect it is to come to David's resolution, "I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress," Psal. xvii. 3. Mere empty desires will not keep weak faculties together; broken bones must have strong bands to close them fast again; a crazy piece of building must be cramped with iron bars to keep it from tottering; so if we would indeed "cleave unto the Lord," we must bring "purpose of heart," even strong resolutions, Acts xi. 23. Cleaving will call for swearing, Deut. x. 20. As it should be our prayer, so also our purpose, to have hearts united to fear God's name, Psal. lxxxvi. 11; whence the phrases of preparing, fixing, confirming, establishing, rooting, grounding, and other like, so frequently occurring in the Scripture, 2 Chron. xxx. 19; 1 Chron. xxix. 18; Eph. iii. 17; Heb. xiii. 9; James v. 8.

3. From regard to our brethren, that by a holy association and spiritual confederacy in heavenly resolutions, every man's example may quicken his brother, and so duties be performed with more vigour and fervency, and return with the greater blessings. If fire be in a whole pile of wood, every stick will burn the brighter, even the greenest wood will take fire in so general a flame. Men usually have more courage in the body of an army, where concurrent shoutings and encouragements do, as it were, infuse mutual spirits into one another, than when they are alone by themselves. David rejoiced in but recounting the companies and armies of God's people when they went up to Jerusalem in their solemn feasts, Psal. lxxxiv. 7. And therefore most covenants in Scripture were general and public, solemnly entered into by a great body of people, as that of Asa, Josiah, and Nehemiah, the forwardness of every man whetting the zeal of his neighbour, Prov. xxvii. 17.

4. From the multitudes, strength, vigilance, malice, assiduous attempts of all our spiritual enemies, which call upon us for the stronger and more united resolutions. For common adversaries usually gain more by our faintness, and divisions, than by their own strength.* Therefore soldiers use to take an oath of fidelity towards their country and service. And † Hannibal's father made him take a solemn oath to maintain perpetual hostility with Rome. Such an ‡ oath have all Christ's soldiers taken; and at the Lord's supper, and in solemn humiliations, they virtually renew the same, never to hold intelligence or correspondence with any of his enemies.

The first thing in a Christian man's armour mentioned by the apostle, Eph. vi. 14, is the § girdle, that which binds on all the other armour, (for so we read of girding on armour, Judg. xviii. 11; 1 Kings xx. 11,) and that girdle is truth. Which we may understand either doctrinally, for steadfastness and stability of judgment in the doctrine of Christ which we profess, not being "carried about with every wind of doctrine," but "holding fast the form of sound words," "knowing * Μήτε ἀπολείψουσιν τὰ σημεῖα, ἤντι ἄλλο πράξουσιν μηδὲν ἰκανῶν τοῦ δήμου. Dionys. Halicarn. l. 10. Ποίησιν τὸ προσταττόμενον ὕπερ των ἀρχόντων κατὰ δύναμιν. Polyb. l. 6. Præmia nunc alia atque alia emolumenta notemus sacramentorum. Juv. Sat. 16. Lips. de Milit. Rom. l. 1. Dial. 6.

† Liv. lib. 35. Appian. in Iberico et Lybico. Polyb. l. 3. v. 20.

‡ Vid. Tertul. de Coron. Milit. c. 11.

§ Cingere est militare. apud Plaut. Et stare distinctum, erat præcipue militatis genus. Sueton. Suidæ ἰσχυρότατοι est καθ' ἑαυτοὺς οὖσι, et ἰσχυρὸν, δύναμις, unde dicitur Deus balteum regum dissolvere. Job xii. 18.

whom we believe," and the certainty of those things wherein we have been instructed, Eph. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 12, 13; Luke i. 4; or else morally and practically, for stedfastness of heart in the faithful discharge of those promises which we have made unto God, (for so faithfulness is compared to a girdle, Isa. xi. 5,) whereby we are preserved from shrinking and tergiversation, in times of trial and in our spiritual warfare. And this faithfulness, the more it is in solemn covenants renewed, the stronger it must needs be, and the better able to bind all our other arms upon us. Christ's enemies will enter into covenants and combinations against him and his church, Psal. ii. 1, 2; lxiv. 5, 6; lxxxiii. 5-8; Acts xxiii. 12; Jer. xi. 9; and our own lusts within us will many times draw from us oaths and obligations to fulfil them, and make them vincula iniquitatis, contrary to the nature of an oath, 1 Kings xix. 2; Mark vi. 23: how much more careful should we be to bind ourselves to God, that our resolutions may be the stronger and more united against so many and confederate enemies!

This point serves, I. For a just reproof of those who are so far from entering into covenant with God, that indeed they make covenants with Satan his greatest enemy, and do in their conversations as it were abuse those promises, and blot out that subscription, and tear off that seal of solemn profession which they had so often set unto the covenant of obedience; such as those in the prophet's time, who had "made a covenant with death, and with hell" were "at agreement," Isa. xxviii. 15. Men are apt to think that none but witches are in covenant with the devil, because such are in the Scripture said to be "consulters with familiar spirits," Deut. xviii. 11; but, as Samuel said to Saul, "Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft," 1 Sam. xv. 23, every stubborn and presumptuous sinner has so much of witchcraft in him, as to hold a kind of spiritual compact with the devil. We read of the serpent and his seed, Gen. iii. 15; of the dragon and his soldiers, Rev.

Alterius esse non possunt nisi diaboli, qui Dei non sunt. Tert. de Idol. exp. 18. et de Habit. Mulieb. c. 8. de Cultu Fœmin. cap. 5.

xii. 7; of some sinners being of the devil, animated by his principles, and actuated by his will and commands, 1 John iii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 26. Satan tempting, and sinners embracing and admitting the temptation upon the inducements suggested, has in it the resemblance of a covenant or compact. There are mutual agreements and promises, as between master and servant, one requiring work to be done, and the other expecting wages to be paid for the doing of it; as in buying and selling, one bargains to have a commodity, and the other to have a price proportionate. Thus we read in some places of the service of sin, John viii. 34; Rom. vi. 16; 2 Pet. ii. 19; and in others, of the wages belonging to that service, Heb. xi. 25; 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11; and elsewhere of the covenant bargain and sale for the mutual securing of the service and of the wages, 1 Kings xxi. 25. Wicked men sell themselves, bargain and grant away their time, and strength, and wit, and abilities, to be at the will and disposal of Satan, for such profits, pleasures, honours, advantages, as are laid in their way to allure them; and thus do they as it were with cords bind themselves to sin, Prov.

v. 22. Ahab bought Naboth's vineyard of the devil, and sold himself for the price in that purchase. Balaam, against the light of his own conscience, and the many discoveries of God's dislike, never gives over his endeavours to curse God's people till he had drawn them into a snare by the Midianitish woman, and all to this end, that he might at last overtake the wages of iniquity which he ran so greedily after, Numb. xxii. 21; xxiii.

* Καὶ τοὺς γε πρῶτους αὐτῶν καὶ δυνάτωτάτους ἐκ ἀθέμιτων ὀρκωμοσίων ἀνάγκην προσηγάγε, παῖδα γὰρ τινα καταθύσας, καὶ ἐπὶ τῶν σπλάγχχνων αὐτοῦ τὰ ὄρκα ποιήσας,

1, 14, 29; xxxi. 16; Jude 11; Micah vi. 5; Rev. ii. 14; 2 Pet. ii. 15. Jezebel binds herself by an oath to murder, 1 Kings xix. 2. Judas makes a bargain for his Master's blood, and at once sells a soul and a Saviour, for so base a price as thirty pieces of silver, Matt. xxvi. 15. Profane Esau makes merchandise of his birthright, whereunto belonged the inheritance, or double portion, the princely power, and the office of priesthood, the blessing, the excellency, and the government, Gen. xlix. 3; 2 Chron. xxi. 3; all which he parts with for one morsel of meat, Heb. xii. 16; being therein a type of all those profane wretches, who deride the ways of godliness and promises of salvation, drowning themselves in sensual delights, and esteeming heaven and hell, salvation and perdition, but as the vain notions of melancholy men, having no other God but their belly, or their gain, Phil. iii. 19; 1 Tim. vi. 5.

So much monstrous wickedness is there in the hearts of men, that they add spurs and whips, to a horse which of himself rusheth into the battle. When the tide of their own lusts, the stream and current of their own headstrong and impetuous affections, do carry them too swiftly before, they yet hoist up sail, and, as it were, spread open their hearts to the winds of temptation, precipitating and urging on their natural lusts by voluntary engagements; tying themselves yet faster to misery than Adam by his fall had tied them, and making themselves, not by nature only, but by compact, "the children of wrath." One makes beforehand a bargain for drunkenness, another contrives a meeting for uncleanness, a third enters into a combination for robbery and cozenage, a fourth makes an oath of revenge and malice; like Ananias and Sapphira, they agree together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord, Acts v. 9. Like Samson's foxes, they join together with firebrands to set the souls of one another on fire, as if they had not title enough to hell except they bargained for it anew, and bound themselves, as it were, by solemn obligations, not to part with it again.

Oh that every presumptuous sinner, who thus sells himself to do wickedly, would seriously consider those sad encumbrances which go along with this his purchase. Those who would have estates to continue in such or such a succession, as they themselves had pretended, have sometimes charged curses and execrations upon those who should alienate, or go about to alter the property and condition of them. These many times are causeless curses, and do not come. But if any man will make bargains with Satan, and will buy the pleasures of sin, he must know that there goes a curse from heaven along with such a purchase, which will make it at the last but a γλυκύπικρον, a sweet bitter, like John's roll, which was sweet in the mouth, but bitter in the belly, Rev. x. 10; like Claudius's mushroom, pleasant, but poisonous; that will blast all the pleasures of sin, and turn all the wages of iniquity in aurum tholosanum, into such gold as ever brought destruction to its owners. It is said of Cn. Seius, that he had a goodly horse, which had all the required perfections of stature, feature, colour, strength, proportion, comeliness, but withal this misery ever attended it, that whosoever became its owner was sure to die an unhappy death. This is the misery that always accompanies the bargain of sin; how pleasant, how profitable, how advantageous soever it may seem to be to flesh and blood, it has always calamity in the end, it ever expires in a miserable death. Honey is very sweet, but it turns into the bitterest choler. The valley of Sodom was one of the ἕπειτα ἐσπλάγχχνευσεν αὐτὰ μετὰ τῶν ἄλλων. Dion. de Catilina, l. 37. Inter cætera vid. Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. 6. c. 8.

Infusum delectabili cibo boletorum venenum. Tascit Annel. lib. 12. Vid. A. Gell. lib. 3. cap. 9. Omnia illic seu factis, seu honesta, seu sonora, seu canora, seu subtilia protulit habere ac si stulticia mellis de libacunculo venenato, nec tantum golum facias voluptatis quanti periculum. Tertul. libid.

most delightful places in the world, but is now become a dead and a standing lake. Let the life of a wicked man run on never so fluently, it has a mare mortuum, a dead sea, as its termination. O, then, when thou art making a covenant with sin, say to thy soul as Boaz said to his kinsman, Ruth iv. 5, 6, At what time thou buyest it, thou must have Ruth the Moabitess with it; if thou wilt have the pleasures, the rewards, the wages of iniquity, thou must also have the curse and damnation that is entailed upon it; and let thy soul answer, as did the kinsman, No, I may not do it, I shall mar and spoil a better inheritance.

11. This may serve for an instruction to us touching the duties of solemn humiliation and repentance. We must not think we have done enough when we have made general acknowledgments and confessions of sin, and begged pardon and grace from God; but we must withal further bind ourselves fast to God by engagements of new obedience, as holy men in the Scripture have done in their more solemn addresses to God, Neh. ix. 38; Psal. li. 12—15; for without amendment of life prayers are but howlings and abominations, Hos. vii. 14; Prov. xxviii. 9. Quantum a præceptis, tantum ab auribus Dei longesumus. No obedience, no audience. A beast will when he is beaten; but men, when God punishes, should not only cry, but covenant.

To the performance whereof, that we may the better apply ourselves, let us a little consider the nature of a religious covenant. A covenant is a mutual stipulation, or a giving and receiving of faith between two parties, whereby they do unanimously agree in one inviolable sentence, or resolution.

Such a covenant there is between God and true believers, he giving himself as a reward to them, and they giving themselves as servants to him. He willing and requiring the service, and they willing and consenting to the reward; he promising to be their God, and they to be his people, Heb. viii. 10. A remarkable form of joint and mutual stipulation we have, Deut. xxvi. 17—19, "Thou hast avouched the Lord this day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice: and the Lord hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, as he hath promised thee, and that thou shouldst keep all his commandments; and to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour; and that thou mayest be an holy people unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken." Where we have both the mutual expressions of intimate relation one to another, and the mutual engagements to universal obedience on the one side, and to high and precious benefits on the other, growing out of that relation. For, because God is mine, I am bound to serve him; and, because I am his, he has bound himself to provide for me. There are two parts of the covenant: 1. That which consists in God's promise to be our God, which, in general, imports thus much, God's giving himself in Christ to us, and, together with Christ, all other good things. Benefits relative, in justification from sin, and adoption to sons. Benefits habitual, a new nature by regeneration, a new heart and life by sanctification, a quiet conscience by peace and comfort. Benefits temporal, in the promises of this life. Benefits eternal, in the glory of the next. Thus is Christ made of God to us wisdom, in our vocation, converting us to faith in him; righteousness, in our justification, reconciling us to his Father; sanctification, in our conformity to him in grace; and redemption, from all evils or enemies which might hate us here, and unto all glory which may fill and everlastingly satisfy us hereafter, 1 Cor. i. 30. This part of the covenant we are not now to consider, but, 2. That part of the covenant which concerns our engagement to God, wherein we promise both ourselves and our abilities to him, to be his people and to do his service.

The material cause of this covenant is whatsoever may be promised to God; and that is, 1. Our persons. 2. Our service.

1. Our persons. "We are thine," Isa. lxiii. 19. Giving our own selves to the Lord, 2 Cor. viii. 5; not esteeming ourselves our own, but his that bought us, 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20; and being willing that he who bought us should have the property in us, and the possession of us, and the dominion over us, and the liberty to do what he pleases with us; being contented to be lost to ourselves, that we may be found in him, Phil. iii. 9. If sin or Satan call for our tongue, or heart, or hand, or eye, to answer, These are not mine own, Christ has bought them, the Lord has set them apart for himself, Psal. iv. 3; they are vessels "meet for the master's use," 2 Tim. ii. 21; I am but the steward of myself, and may not dispose of my Master's goods without, much less against, his will and commands.

2. Our services; which are, 1. Matters of necessity; 2. Matters of expediency; and, 3. Matters of praise. All which may be made the materials of a covenant.†

1. Matter of duty and necessity. As David by an oath binds himself to keep God's righteous judgments, Psal. exix. 106. And the people in Nehemiah's time enter into a curse and an oath to walk in God's law, and to observe and do all his commandments, Neh. x. 29.

2. Matter of circumstantial expediency, which, in Christian wisdom, may be conducive to the main end of a man's life, or may fit him for any special condition to which God calls him. So the Rechabites promised their father Jonadab, and held that promise obligatory in the sight of God, not to drink wine, nor to build houses, &c., Jer. xxxv. 6, 7; because by that voluntary hardship of life they should be the better fitted to bear that captivity which was to come upon them; or because thereby they should the better express the condition of strangers amongst God's people, upon whose outward comforts they would not seem too much to encroach, that it might appear that they did not incorporate with them for mere secular, but for spiritual, benefits. It was lawful for Paul to have received wages and rewards for his work in the gospel as well of the churches of Achaia, as of Macedonia and others, as he proves, 1 Cor. ix. 4, 14; yet he seems upon the case of expediency, that he might "cut off occasion from them, which" desired "occasion," and might the better promote the gospel, to bind himself by an oath, (for so much these words, "As the truth of Christ is in me," do import, as the learned have observed,) never to be burdensome in that kind to those churches, 2 Cor. xi. 7—12. Lawful things, when inexpedient and gravaminous, may be forborne by the bond of a covenant.

3. Matter of thanksgiving and praise to God; in which case it was usual to make, and to pay, vows. "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?" saith David; "I will take the cup of salvation," (as the use of the Jews was in their feasts and sacrifices of thanksgiving, Luke xxii. 17.) "I will pay * Socrati cum multa multi pro suis facultatibus offerrent, Æschines, pauper auditor, nihil inquit, dignum to quod dare tibi possim invenio, et hoc uno modo pauperem me esse sentio, itaque dono tibi quod unum habeo, meipsum. Seneca de Benef. lib. i. cap. 8.

† Sunt quedam quæ etiam non volentes debemus: quædam etiam quæ nisi vocerimus non debemus, sed postquam ea Deo promittimus necessario ea reddere constringimur. Aug.

my vows unto the Lord." Whereby it appears that godly men, when they prayed for mercies, did, likewise, by vows and covenants bind themselves to return tribute of praise in some particular kind or other, upon their prayers being heard, Psal. cxvi. 12—14; cxxiii. 2, 3; so Jacob did, Gen. xxviii. 22; so Jephthah, Judg. xi. 30, 31; so Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 11, 27, 28; so Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 20; so Jonah, chap. ii. 9; and so Zaccheus, to testify his thankfulness to Christ for his conversion, and to testify his thorough mortification of covetousness, which had been his master-sin, did not only out of duty make restitution where he had done wrong, but out of bounty engaged himself to give the half of his goods to the poor, Luke xix. 8.

The formal cause of a covenant is the plighting of our fidelity and engaging of our truth to God in that particular which is the matter of our covenant. Which is done two ways; either by a simple promise and stipulation, as that of Zaccheus; or in a more solemn way, by the intervention of an oath, or curse, or subscription, as in the case of Nehemiah and the people, Neh. ix.

The efficient cause is the person entering into the covenant; in whom these things are to concur:

1. A clear knowledge, and deliberate weighing of the matter promised, because error, deception, or ignorance, are contrary to the formal notion of that consent, which in every covenant is intrinsecal and necessary thereunto. Nam videtur consentire qui errat.

2. A free and willing concurrence. In omni pacto intercedit actio spontanea, and so in every promise. Not but that authority may impose oaths, and those as well promissory as assertory, Gen. xxiv. 3; 1 Kings ii. 42; Ezra x. 3, 5; as Josiah made a covenant and caused the people to stand to it, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 31, 32. But that the matter of it, though imposed, should be such in the nature of the thing as that it may be taken in judgment and righteousness, that so the person may not be hampered in any such hesitancy of conscience as will not consist with a pious, spontaneous, and voluntary concurrence.

3. A power to make the promise, and bind oneself by it. For a man may have power to make a promise which is not finally obligatory, but upon supposition; as a woman might for her own part vow, and by that vow be bound up as to herself, but this bond was but conditional, as to efficacy and influence upon the effect, to wit, if her husband heard it and held his peace, Numb. xxx. 3, 4, 14.

4. A power, having made the promise, to perform it. And this depends on the nature of the thing; which must be, first, possible, for impossibile nulla est obligatio. No man can bind himself to things impossible. And next, lawful, in regard either of the necessity, or expediency, or some other allowableness in the thing. For turpe est jure impossibile, we can do nothing but that which we can do rightfully. Sinful things are in construction of law impossible, and so can induce no obligation.

A servant can make no promise to the dishonour or servitude of his master; nor a child or pupil, contrary to the will of his parent or guardian; nor a Christian, to the dishonour or against the will of Christ whom he serves. In every such sinful engagement there is intrinsecally dolus, error, deceptio, the heart is blinded by the deceitfulness of lust, Eph. iv. 18, 22; Heb. iii. 13; 2 Pet. i. 9; 2 Cor. xi. 3. And these things are destructive to the nature of such an action as must be deliberate and spontaneous. Promises of this kind bind to nothing but repentance.

From these considerations we may learn what to judge of the promises which many men make of doing service to God.

1. Some join in covenants as the greatest part of that tumultuous concourse of people, who made an uproar against the apostle, were gathered together, they "knew not wherefore," Acts xix. 32. Such do not understand the things which they promise; as if a man should set his hand and seal to an obligation, and not know its contents or conditions. Such are all ignorant Christians, who have often renewed their covenant of new obedience and faith in Christ, and yet know not what the faith of Christ is, or what is the purity, spirituality, and comprehensiveness of that law to which they have sworn. As the apostle saith of the Jews, If they had known they would not have crucified the Lord of glory; we may say of many of these, If they knew the purity and holiness of those things which they have vowed to keep, they either would not have entered into covenant with God at all, or would be more conscientious and vigilant in their observation of it. It is a sign of a man desperately careless, to run daily into debt, and never so much as remember or consider what he owes. If there were no other obligation to tie men to the knowledge of God's will, this alone were sufficient, that they have undertaken to serve him, and therefore by their own covenants are bound to know him. For surely many men who have promised repentance from dead works, if they did indeed consider what that repentance is, and to what a strict and narrow way of walking it confines them, would go nigh, if they durst, to plead an error in the contract, and to profess that they had not thought their obligation had had engaged them to so severe and rigid a service, and so repent of their repentance. But in this case, ignorance of what a man ought to know, cannot void the covenant which he is bound to make, and, having made, to keep; but his covenant exceedingly aggravates his ignorance.

2. Some make many fair promises of obedience, but it is on the rack, and in the furnace, or as scholars under the rod. Oh if I might but recover this sickness, or be eased of this affliction, I would then be a new man, and redeem my mispent time. And yet many of these, like Pharaoh, when they have any respite, find out ways to shift and elude their own promises, and, like melted metal taken out of the furnace, return again to their former hardness. So a good divine observes of the people of this land in the time of the great sweat in king Edward's days, (I wish we could find even so much in these days of calamity on which we are fallen,) as long as the heat of the plague lasted, there was crying out of, We have sinned; mercy, good Lord, mercy, mercy. Then people of the highest rank cried out to the ministers, For God's sake tell us what shall we do to avoid the wrath of God. Take these bags, pay so much to such a one whom I deceived, so much restore to another whom in bargaining I overreached, give so much to the poor, so much to pious uses. But after the sickness was over, they were just the same as they were before. Thus in times of trouble men are apt to make many prayers and covenants, to cry to God, "Arise, and save us," Jer. ii. 27. "Deliver us only, we pray thee, this day," Judg. x. 15. They inquire early after God, and flatter him with their lips, and own him as their God, and Rock of salvation, and presently start aside like a deceitful bow. As Austin notes, that in times of calamity the very heathen would flock to the Christian churches to be safe amongst them. And when the Lord sent lions amongst the Samaritans, then they sent to inquire after "the manner of the God of the land," 2 Kings xvii. 25, 26. Thus many men's covenants are founded only in terrors of conscience. They throw out their sins as a merchant at Qui per delictorum penitentiam instituerunt Domino satisfecere, diabolo par aliam penitentiam penitentiam satisfaciunt, et tunc tantum magis perosus Deo quanto amolus ejus acceptus. Tertul. de Patient. c. 2.

Impia promissio est que scilicet adim-pletur. Juramentum non est vinculum Iniquitatis. Vid.
Caus. 22. q. 4.
Prestare factore posse non fidem si scilicet cavet, interdum scilicet est fides.
Senec.

Quare vides pefu-lante et procceter insultare servis Christi sunt in his partibus qui illum interitum clademque non evasissent, nisi servos Christi se esse
fuisse. De Civ.
Dei, l. 1. c. 1.

sea his rich commodities in a tempest, but in a calm wish for them again. Neither do they throw away the property over them, but only the dangerous possession of them. This is not a full, cheerful, and voluntary action, but only a languid and inconstant velleity; contrary to that largeness of heart and fixed disposition which Christ's own people bring to his service, as David and the nobles of Israel offered willingly and with joy unto the Lord, 1 Chron. xxix. 17.

3. Since a covenant presupposes a power in him that makes it, both over his own will, and over the matter, thing, or action which he promises, so far as to be enabled to make the promise; and since we of ourselves have neither will, nor deed, nor sufficiency, either to think or to perform, Rom. vii. 18; 2 Cor. iii. 5; Phil. ii. 13. We hence learn, in all the covenants which we make, not to do it in any confidence in our own strength, or in any self-dependence on our own hearts, which are false and deceitful, and may, after a confident undertaking, use us as Peter's used him; but still to have our eyes on the aid and help of God's grace, to use our covenants as means the better to stir up God's graces in us, and our prayers to him for further supplies of it. As David, "I will keep thy statutes;" but then, "O forsake me not utterly," Psal. cxix. 8. Our promises of duty must ever be supported by God's promises of grace; when we have undertaken to serve him, we must remember to pray as Ihezekiah did, "O Lord, I am oppressed; undertake for me," Isa. xxxviii. 14. Our good works cannot come forth from us, till God first of all work them in us, Isa. xxvi. 12. He must perform his promises of grace to us, before we can ours of service unto him. Nothing of ours can go to heaven except we first receive it from heaven. We are able to do nothing but in and by "Christ which strengtheneth" us, John xv. 5; Phil. iv. 13. So that every religious covenant which we make has indeed a double obligation in it; an obligation to the duty promised, that we may stir up ourselves to perform it; and an obligation to prayer, and recourse to God, that he would furnish us with grace to perform it: as he that has bound himself to pay a debt, and has no money of his own to do it, is constrained to betake himself to supplications that he may procure the money of some other friend.

4. The final cause of a covenant is to induce an obligation where was none before, or else to double and strengthen it where one was before, to be vinculum conservando fidei, a bond to preserve truth and fidelity. Being subject to many temptations, and having backsliding and revolting hearts, apt, if they be not kept up to service, to draw back from it, therefore we use ourselves as men do cowardly soldiers, set them there where they must fight, and shall not be able to run away, or fall off from service.

III. This should serve to humble us on a twofold consideration:

1. Of the falseness and unstedfastness of our hearts, which want such covenants to bind them, and, as it were, fasten them to the altar with cords: as men put locks and fetters upon wild horses, whom otherwise no enclosure would shut in. Our hearts, as Jacob said of Reuben, Gen. xlix. 4, are "unstable as water;" as the prophet calls them. * Moist bodies (as water is) non continentur suis terminis, do not set bounds to themselves, as solid and compacted bodies do, but shed all abroad, if left to themselves: the way to keep them united together is to put them into a close vessel: so the heart of man can set itself no bounds, but falls all asunder, and out of frame, τε ἀνάχυσον, as the apostle's expression is, 1 Pet. iv. 4. if it be not fastened and bound together by such strong resolutions. Sometimes men, either by the power of the word, or by the sharpness of some affliction, are quickened and inflamed to pious purposes, like green wood which blazes while the bellows are blowing; and now they think they have their hearts sure, and shall continue them in a good frame, to-morrow shall be as this day. But presently, like an instrument in change of weather, they are out of tune again, and, like the chameleon, presently change colour; and, as Chrysostom saith, the preacher, of all workmen, seldom finds his work as he left it. Nothing but the grace of God balances and establishes the heart, and holy covenants are an ordinance or means which he has been pleased to sanctify to this purpose, that by them, as instruments, grace, as the principal cause, might keep the heart stedfast in duty. If, then, Isaiah bewail the uncleanness of his lips, and Job suspect the uncleanness and wandering of his eyes, what reason have we to be humbled for this unstedfastness of our hearts, from whence the diffidence and looseness of every other faculty proceed!

2. If we must bewail the falseness of our hearts that stand in need of covenants, how much more should we bewail their perfidiousness in the violation of covenants! that they take occasion even by restraint, like a river that is stopped in its course, to grow more unruly; or, as a man after an ague, which took away his stomach, to return with stronger appetite to sin again. To crucify our sins, and in repentance to put them, as it were, to shame, and then to take them down from the cross again, and fetch them to life, and repent of repentance; to vow, and "after vows to make inquiry," Prov. xx. 25; this is a very ill requital to Christ. He came from glory to suffer for us, and here met with many discouragements, not only from enemies, but from friends and disciples; Judas betrays him. Peter denies him, his disciples sleep, his kinsfolks stand afar off; yet he does not look back from a cross to a crown, and though he be tempted to come down from the cross, yet he stays it out, that he might love and save us to the uttermost: but no sooner are we out of Egypt and Sodom, than we have hankering affections to return, at the least to look backwards again.

We engage ourselves to be ruled by the word of the Lord, as the Jews did, Jer. xlii. 5, 6; and with them, Jer. xliii. 2, when we know his word evil against it, and shrink away from our own resolutions. Oh how should this humble us, and make us vile in our own eyes! God is exceeding angry with the breach of but human covenants, Jer. xxv. 18; Ezek. xvii. 18; how much more with the breach of holy covenants between himself and us! He threatens to revenge severely the quarrel of his covenant, Lev. xxvi. 25; and so doubtless he now does, and will do still, except we take a penitent revenge upon ourselves for it. And therefore,

IV. Having entered into covenant, we should use double diligence in our performance of it, quickening and stirring up ourselves thereto by the consideration,

1. Of the stability of his covenant with us, even "the sure mercies of David," Isa. liv. 8, 9; Iv. 3. To break faith with a false person were a fault, but to deceive him that never fails nor forsakes us, increases both the guilt and the unkindness.

2. Of his continued and renewed mercies. If he were a wilderness unto us, there might be some colour to repent us Homil. 13. ad Popul. Antioch.

Spumæus, et ferrens et ab obice sævior Hæd. Ovid. Senec. Nat. Quæst. l. 6. c. 17.

obligatio est juris vinculum quo necessitate adstringimur alterius servandæ res. Instic. lib. 3. T. 11. Vul. Gregor. in Tholos. de Repub. lib. 9. cap. 8.

* ὕγρον τὸ ἀδύριστον οἰκεῖν ἕρπ. Aristot. de Gener. et Corrupt. lib. 2. cap. 2. Hinc qui vitam a-unt mollem, remissam, voluptuariam, in hanc et illam partem flexilem dicuntur. Βίον ζῆν τὸν ὑγρὸν καὶ διαρρίοντα. Chrys. Rom. xiii. xiv. et Suidæ, ὑγρὸς dicitur ὁ εὐκατάφορος εἰς τὰς ἡδονάς. Ejus animus qui nunc luxuria et lascivâ diffult. Terent. Heauton. Messallina facilitate adulterum in fastidium versa ad incognitas libidines profuebat. Tacit. Annal. l. 11.

Vid. Chrysost. in Psal. cxxii.

of our bargain, and to look out for a better service. But it is not only unthankfulness, but folly, to make a forfeiture of mercies, and to put God, by our breach of covenant with him, to break his with us too, Jer. ii. 5—8; xxxi. 31—34; Numb. xiv. 34; Jonah ii. 8.

3. Of our baptism and the tenor thereof, wherein we solemnly promise to keep "a good conscience," and "to observe all things whatsoever" Christ commands us, 1 Pet. iii. 21; Matt. xxviii. 19, 20. From which engagement we cannot recede without the note and infamy of greater perfiduousness. To take Christ's pay and do sin service, to be a subject to Michael and a pensioner to the dragon, to wear the livery of one master and do the work of another, to be an Israelite in title and a Samaritan in truth, this is either to forget or to deride our baptism, 2 Pet. i. 9, for therein we did as it were subscribe our names, and list ourselves in the register of Zion; and as it is a high honour to be enrolled in the genealogies of the church, so is a great dishonour to be expunged from thence, and to be "written in the earth," and have our names with our bodies putrify into perpetual oblivion, Jer. xvii. 13; Neh. vii. 64, 65.

4. Of the seal and witnesses whereby this covenant has been confirmed. Sealed in our own consciences by the seal of faith, believing the holiness of God's ways, and the excellency of his rewards, for "he that hath received his testimony hath set to his seal that God is true," John iii. 33; mutually attested by our spirits, feeling the sweetness of duty, and by God's Spirit, revealing the certainty of reward, Rom. viii. 16; and this in the presence of angels and saints, into whose communion we are admitted, 1 Cor. xi. 10; Heb. xii. 22; so that we cannot depart from this covenant without shaming ourselves to God, to angels, to men, and to our own consciences. Yea, the font where we were baptized, and the table where we have sacramentally eaten and drank the body and blood of Christ, and the very seats where we have sat attending to his voice, like Joshua's stone, Josh. xxiv. 27, will be witnesses against us if we deny our covenant, though there be no need of witnesses against those who have to do with the Searcher of hearts and the Judge of consciences, that consuming fire whom no lead, no dross, no reprobate silver, no false metal, can endure or deceive, no Ananias or Sapphira lie unto without their own undoing.

5. Of the estate which these covenants refer to, and the tenor whereunto these services are annexed, which is "eternal life." After we have had patience to keep our short promises of doing God's will, he will perform his eternal promises of giving himself unto us. And who would forfeit an inheritance for not payment of a small homage or quit-rent reserved upon it? If we expect eternal life from him, there is great reason we should dedicate a mortal life to him. Let us not pay our service in dross, when we expect our wages in gold.

Having handled the general doctrine of our entering into covenant with God, I shall now proceed to the particulars to which they here engage themselves, whereof the first is a solemn thanksgiving, "so will we render the calves of our lips." All the sacrifices of the Jews were of two sorts: some were illogical, propitiatory, or expiatory, for pardon of sin, or impetration of favour; others were eucharistical, "sacrifices of thanksgiving," (as the peace-offerings, Lev. vii. 12,) for mercies obtained, Psal. cvii. 22. With relation to these, the church here, having prayed for forgiveness of sin, and for the obtaining of blessings, doth hereupon, for the further enforcement of those petitions, promise to offer the peace-offerings of praise, not in the naked and empty ceremony, but with the spiritual life and substance, namely, the calves of their lips, which are moved by the inward principles of hearty sincerity and thanksgiving.

From hence we learn, that sound conversion and repentance enlarges the heart in thankfulness towards God, and disposes it to offer up the sacrifice of praise. And this duty here promised we may consider,

I. Ut materiam pacti, as the matter of a covenant or compact, which we promise to render to God in acknowledgment of his great mercy in answering the prayers which we put up to him for pardon and grace. It is observable, that most of those psalms wherein David implores help from God, are closed with thanksgivings to him, as Psal. vii. 17; xiii. 5, 6; lvi. 12, 13; lvii. 7—11; David thus by a holy craft insinuating himself into God's favour, and driving a trade between earth and heaven, receiving and returning, importing one commodity and transporting another, letting God know that his mercies shall not be lost, that as he bestows the comforts of them upon him, so he would return the praises of them unto heaven again. Those countries that have rich and staple commodities to exchange and return to others, have usually the freest and fullest traffic and resort of trade made to them. Now there is no such rich return from earth to heaven as praises; indeed to celebrate appreciatively his goodness towards us is the only tribute we can pay to God. As in the flux and reflux of the sea, the water that in the one comes from the sea to the shore, does in the other but run back into itself again: so praises are as it were the return of mercies into themselves, or into that bosom and fountain of God's love from whence they flowed; and therefore the richer any heart is in praises, the more speedy and copious are the returns of mercy to it. God has so ordered the creatures amongst themselves, that there is a kind of natural confederacy and mutual negotiation amongst them, each one receiving and returning, deriving to others, and drawing from others what serves most for the conservation of them all, and every thing by various interchanges and vicissitudes flowing back into the original from whence it came; thereby teaching the souls of men to maintain the like spiritual commerce and confederacy with heaven, to have all the passages between them and it open and unobstructed, that the mercies which they receive from thence may not be kept under and imprisoned in unthankfulness, but may have free course in daily praises to return to their fountain again. Thus Noah, after his deliverance from the flood, built an altar, on which to sacrifice "the sacrifices of thanksgiving," that as his family by the ark was preserved from perishing, so the memory of so great a mercy might in like manner by the altar be preserved too, Gen. viii. 20. So Abraham, after a weary journey, being comforted with God's gracious manifestation of himself unto him, built an altar, and "called on the name of the Lord," Gen. xii. 7, 8; and after another journey out of Egypt, was not forgetful to return to that place again, Gen. xiii. 4; God's presence drawing forth his praises, as the return of the sun in spring and summer causes the earth to thrust forth her fruits and flowers, that they may as it were meet and do homage to the fountain of their beauty. If Hezekiah may be delivered from death, Isa. xxxviii. 20; if David from guilt, Psal. li. 14; they promise to sing aloud of so great mercy, and to associate others with them in their praises: "Then will I teach transgressors thy ways," and "will sing to the stringed instruments." Guilt stops the mouth, and makes it "speechless," Matt. xxii. 12, that it cannot answer for one of a thousand sins, nor acknowledge one of a thousand mercies. When Jacob begged God's blessing on him in his journey, he vowed a vow of obedience and thankfulness to the Lord, seconding God's promises of

David omnes fere
Psalms in quibus Dei auxilium implorebat, gratiarum
actione claudit.
Muis in Psal. x. 6.

mercy with his promises of praise, and answering all the parts thereof: "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God." If he single out me and my seed, to set us up as marks for his angels to descend to, with protection and mercy, and will indeed give this land to us, and return me "to my father's house in peace;" then "this stone, which I have set up for a pillar" and monument, "shall be God's house," for me and my seed to praise him in: and accordingly we find he built an altar there, and changed the name of that place, calling it Beth-el, the house of God; and God, El-beth-el, the God of Beth-el. And lastly, if God indeed will not leave nor forsake me, but will give so rich a land as this unto me, I will surely return a homage back, "of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee." So punctual is this holy man to restitute for each distinct promise a distinct praise, and to take the quality of his vows from the quality of God's mercies, Gen. xviii. 13—22; xxxv. 6—15. Lastly, Jonah out of the belly of hell cries to God, and vows unto him a vow, that he would "sacrifice with the voice of thanksgiving," and tell all ages that "salvation is of the Lord," Jonah ii. 9. Thus we may consider praises as the matter of the church's covenant.

II. Ut fructum penitentiae, as a fruit of true repentance, and deliverance from sin. When sin is taken away, when grace is obtained, then indeed is a man in a right disposition to give praises to God. When we are brought out of a wilderness into Canaan, Deut. viii. 10, out of Babylon to Zion, Jer. xxx. 18, 19, then saith the prophet, "Out of them shall proceed thanksgiving and the voice of them that make merry." When Israel had passed through the Red Sea, and saw the Egyptians dead on the shore, the great type of our deliverance from sin, death, and Satan, then they sing that triumphant song, Moses and the men singing the song, and Miriam and the women answering them, and repeating over again the burden of the song; "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea," Exod. xv. 1, 20, 21. When a poor soul has been with Jonah in the midst of the seas, compassed with the floods, closed in with the depths, brought down to the bottom of the mountains, wrapt about head and heart and all over with the weeds, and locked up with the bars of sin and death; when it has felt the weight of a guilty conscience, and been terrified with the fearful expectation of an approaching curse, lying as it were at the pit's brink, within the smoke of hell, within the smell of that brimstone and scorplings of that unquenchable fire which is kindled for the devil and his angels; and is then, by a more bottomless and unsearchable mercy, brought to dry land, snatched as a brand out of the fire, translated into a glorious condition, from a law to a gospel, from a curse to a crown, from damnation to an inheritance, from a slave to a son; then, then only, never till then, is that soul in a fit disposition to sing praises unto God. When God has forgiven all a man's "iniquities," and healed all the "diseases" of his soul, and redeemed his "life from destruction," or from hell, (as the Chaldee renders it,) and crowned him "with loving-kindness and tender mercies," turning away his anger, and revealing those mercies which are "from everlasting" in election "to everlasting" in salvation, removing his sins from him "as far as the east is from the west;" then a man will call upon his soul over and over again, and summon Ab eterno per destinationem in eternum per glorificationem. Bernand. serm. 2. in Ascens. Dom.

* Est in malorum potestate peccare; ut autem peccando hoc vel hoc illa mala faciant, non est in illorum potestate, sed Dei dividitis tenebras, et ordinantis oas, ut huic etiam quod every faculty within him, and invite every creature without him, to "bless the Lord," and to ingeminate praises to his holy name, Psal. ciii. 1—22. As David begins that Psalm with "Bless the Lord, O my soul," and ends it with "Bless the Lord, O my soul;" so the apostle, making mention of the like mercy of God to him, and of the exceeding abundant grace of Christ, in setting forth him who was "a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious," "for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting;" begins this meditation with praises, "I thank Christ Jesus our Lord;" and ends it with praises, "Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen," 1 Tim. i. 12—17. It is impossible that soul should be truly thankful to God, which has no apprehensions of him, but as an enemy, ready to call in, or at the least to curse, all those outward benefits which, in that little interim and respite of time between the curse pronounced in the law and executed in death, he vouchsafes to bestow. And impenitent sinners can have no true notion of God but such. And therefore all the verbal thanks which such men seem to render to God for blessings, are but like the music at a funeral, or the trumpet before a judge, which gives no comfortable sound to the mourning wife, or to the guilty prisoner.

III. Ut medium impetrandi, as an argument and motive to prevail with God in prayer. For the church here prays for pardon, for grace, for healing, not only with an eye to its own benefit, but to God's honour. Lord, when thou hast heard and answered us, then we shall glorify thee, Psal. l. 15. "I will praise thee," saith David; "for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation," Psal. cxviii. 21. It is true, if God condemn us, he will therein show forth his own glory, 2 Thess. i. 9, as he did upon Pharaoh, Rom. ix. 17; in which sense the "strong" and "terrible" ones are said to "glorify" him, Isa. xxv. 3, 5, because his power in their destruction is made the more conspicuous. But we should not therein concur to the glorying of him. "What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? Shall it declare thy truth?" Psal. xxx. 9; lxxviii. 10, 11. "The living, the living, he shall praise thee," Isa. xxxviii. 19. This is a frequent argument with David whereby to prevail for mercy, because else God would lose the praise which by this means he should render to his name, Psal. vi. 4, 5; cxviii. 17. God indeed is all-sufficient to himself, and no goodness of ours can extend unto him, Job xxii. 2; xxxv. 7; yet as parents delight to use the labour of their children in things which are no way beneficial to themselves, so God is pleased to use us as instruments for setting forth his glory, though his glory stands in no need of us, though we cannot add thereto one cubit. He has made all men in usus profundarum cogitationum suarum, for the uses of his unsearchable counsels. "The Lord hath made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil," Prov. xvi. 4. Yet he is pleased to esteem some men "meat" for uses for which others are not, 2 Tim. ii. 21, and to "set apart" some for himself, and for those uses, Psal. iv. 3; Isa. xlii. 21. * God by his wisdom ordereth and draweth the blind and brute motions of the worst creatures to his own honour, as the huntsman does the rage of the dog to his pleasure, or the mariner the blowing of the wind to his voyage, or the artist the heat of the fire to his work, or the physician the bloodthirstiness of the leech to a cure. But godly men are fitted to bring Deus suam gloriam quaerit non propter se sed propter nos. Aquin. 2. q. 32. art. 1. ad 1. m.

August. de Nuptiis et Concupis. lib. 2. cap. 16. Omnia propter se ipsam fecit Deus, omnia propter nos. Bern. ser. 3. in Die Pentecost.

faciunt contra voluntatem Dei, non impleatur nisi voluntas Dei. Aug. de præ. Sanct. c. 16.

actually glory to him, to glorify him operatively, 1 Cor. x. 30, 31; Eph. i. 11, 12. And this is that in which God chiefly delights.

Our Saviour bids his disciples cast their net into the sea, and when they had drawn their net, he bids them bring of the fish which they had then caught, and yet we find that there was on the land before a fire of coals, and fish laid thereon, and bread, John xxi. 6—10; thereby teaching us that he did not use their industry for any need that he had of it, but because he would honour them so far as to let them honour him with their obedience. And therefore even then when God tells his people that he needed not their services, he calls yet upon them for thanksgiving, Psal. l. 9, 14.

This then is a strong argument to be used in prayer for pardon, for grace, for any spiritual mercy, Lord, if I perish, I shall not praise thee, I shall not be meet for my Master's uses. Thy glory will only be forced out of me with blows, like fire out of a flint, or water out of a rock. But thou delightest to see thy poor servants operate towards thy glory, to see them not forced by power but by love to show forth thy praises. And this we shall never do till sin be pardoned. God can bring light out of light, as the light of the stars out of the light of the sun, and he can bring light out of darkness, as he did at first; but in the one case there is a meetness for such a use, in the other not. Now we are not meet subjects for God to reap honour from, till sin be pardoned, till grace be conferred. Then we shall give him the praise of his mercy, in pitying such grievous sinners; and the praise of his power and wisdom, in healing such mortal diseases; and the praise of his glorious and free grace, in sending salvation to those that did not inquire after it; and the praise of his patience, in forbearing us so long, and waiting that he might be gracious; and the praise of his wonderful providence, in causing all things to work together for our good; and the praise of his justice, by taking part with him against our own sins, and joining with his grace to revenge the blood of Christ upon them. A potsherd is good enough to hold fire, but nothing but a sound and pure vessel is meet to contain wine or any rich depositum.

IV. Ut principium operandi, as a principle of emendation of life, and of new obedience. Lord, "take away all iniquity," and receive us into favour, then will we be thankful unto thee, and that shall produce amendment of life: "Asshur shall not save us, we will not ride upon horses, neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods; for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy." A thankful apprehension of the goodness of God in forgiving, giving, saving, honouring us, is one of the principal foundations of sincere obedience. Then the soul will think nothing too good for God, who has showed himself so good to it. "What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?" saith the prophet David, Psal. cxvi. 12: and a little after, "O Lord, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid;" that is, a home-born servant, thine from my mother's womb. It is an allusion to those who were born of servants in the house of their masters, and so were in a condition of servants. Partus sequitur ventrem. If the mother be a handmaid, the child is a servant too; and so the Scripture calls them filios domus, children of the house, Gen. xiv. 14; xv. 3; xvii. 12;

* Si mihi irascatur Deus, num illi ego similiter redirascar? non utique sed pavebo, sed contremiscam, sed veniam deprecabor. Ita si me arguat, non redarguetur a me, sed ex me potius justificabitur; uer si me iudicabit, iudicabo ego eum, sed adorabo: si dominatur, me operat servire; si imperat, me oportet parere; nunc jam videas de amore quam aliter sit. Nam cum amat Deus non aliud vult quam amari. Bern. serm. 83. in Cantic.

Lev. xxii. 11. His heart being enlarged in thankfulness, presently reminded him of the deep engagements which bound him to service even from the womb. True filial and evangelical obedience arises from faith and love. Faith shows us God's love to us, and thereby works in us a reciprocal love to him; "We love him, because he first loved us," 1 John iv. 19. This is the only thing wherein a servant of God may answer him, and may de simili mutuum rependere vicem, as Bernard speaks, return back to God what is his own gift. "If he be angry with me, I must not be angry again with him, but fear and tremble, and beg for pardon; if he reprove me, I must not reprove, but justify him; if he judge me, I must not judge, but adore him: but if he love me, I must take the boldness to love him again, for therefore he loves, that he may be loved. And this love of ours to Christ makes us ready to do every thing which he requires of us, because we know that he has done much more for us than he requires of us. "The love of Christ," saith the apostle, "constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead;" that is, either dead in and with him, in regard of the guilt and punishment of sin, so as to be freed from the damnation of it; or dead by way of conformity to his death, in dying unto sin, and crucifying the old man, so as to shake off its power and strength. And the fruit of all, both his dying and our loving, is this, "that we should not live unto ourselves, but unto him which died for us, and rose again," 2 Cor. v. 14, 15. Thus love argues from the greater to the lesser, from the greatness of his work for us to the smallness of ours unto him; if he died to give us life, then we must live to do him service.

† Fear produces only servile and unwilling performances. As those fruits which grow in winter, or in cold countries, are sour, unsavoury, and unconcocted, but those which grow in summer, or in hotter countries, by the warmth and influence of the sun are sweet and wholesome; such is the difference between those fruits of obedience which fear and which love produces. The most formal principle of obedience is love, and the first beginnings of love in us to God arise from his mercies to us being thankfully remembered; and this teaches the soul thus to argue, God has given deliverances to me, and should I break his commandments? Christ gave himself to redeem me from all iniquity, and to make me in a special manner his own, therefore I must be "zealous of good works," Tit. ii. 14; therefore I must "show forth the praises of him who hath called me out of darkness into his marvellous light," 1 Pet. ii. 9. No more frequent, more copious common-place in all the Scriptures than this, to call for obedience, and to aggravate disobedience, by the consideration of the great things that God has done for us, Deut. x. 20, 21; xi. 7—9; xxxii. 6, 7; Josh. xxiv. 2—14; 1 Sam. xii. 24; Isa. i. 2; Jer. ii. 5, 6; Hos. ii. 8; Micah vi. 3—5. In the law a ransomed man became the servant of him who bought and delivered him; and upon this argument the apostle calls for obedience: "Ye are not your own; for ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's," 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. We have but the use of ourselves, the property is his, and we may do nothing to violate that.

V. Ut instrumentum Divinæ gloriæ, as a means and instrument of publishing God's praises. There is an emphasis in the word "lips." Sometimes it is a diminutive word, taking away from the duty performed, as Matt. xv. 8, "This people honoureth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me;" but here it is an augmentative word, which enlarges the duty, rendering it more comprehensive. "I will sacrifice unto thee," saith Jonah, "with the voice of thanksgiving," Jonah ii. 9. God regards not the sacrifice if this be not the use that is made of it, to publish and celebrate the glory of his name. The outward ceremony is nothing without the thankfulness of the heart, and the thankfulness of the heart is too little except it have a voice to proclaim it abroad, that others also may learn to glorify and admire the works of the Lord. It is not enough to "sacrifice," not enough to sacrifice "the sacrifices of thanksgiving," except whilst we "declare his works with rejoicing," Psal. evii. 22. There is a private thankfulness of the soul within itself, when, meditating on the goodness of God, it does in secret return the tribute of a humble and obedient heart back again unto him, which is to praise God on the bed; and there is public thanksgiving, when men "tell of all the wondrous works" of God "in the congregation of his saints," Psal. xxvi. 7, 12; cxlix. 1, 5. Now here the church promises this public thanksgiving, it shall not be the thankfulness of the heart only, but of the lips too; as it is noted of the thankful leper, that he "with a loud voice glorified God," Luke xvii. 15. "The living, the living, he shall praise thee," saith Hezekiah. But how should they do it? "The fathers to the children shall make known thy truth," Isa. xxxviii. 19. There are some affections and motions of the heart which stop the mouth, being of a cold, stupefactive, constringent nature, as the sap stays and hides itself in the root while it is winter; such is fear and extremity of grief. "Assemble yourselves," saith the

† Vere Christianus est qui plus amat Dominum quam timet gehennam, ut etiam si dicat illi Deus, utere deliciis carnalibus sempiternis, et quantum potes pecca, nec morieris nec in gehennam mitteris, sed mecum tantummodo non eris; exhorrescat et omnino non peccet; non jam ut in illud quod timebat non incidat, sed ne illum quem sic amat offendat. Bern. de Catechizand. Rudibus, c. 17.

Flutarec. de Ca-
nientia. et Hostilium Utilitate. Arist.
Problems. sect. 27.

prophet, "and let us enter into the defenced cities, and let us be silent there; for the Lord our God hath put us to silence," Jer. viii. 14; Isa. x. 14. Other affections open the mouth, are of an expansive and dilating nature, know not how to be straitened or suppressed; and of all these, joy, and sense of God's mercy, can least contain itself in the compass of our narrow breast, but will spread and communicate itself to others. A godly heart is in this like to those flowers which shut when the sun sets and the night comes, and open again when the sun returns and shines upon them. If God withdraw his favour, and send a night of affliction, they shut up themselves and their thoughts in silence; but if he shine again, and shed abroad the light and sense of his love upon them, then their heart and mouth are wide open towards heaven in lifting up praises unto him. Hannah prayed silently so long as she was in bitterness of soul, and of a sorrowful spirit, but as soon as God answered her prayers, and filled her heart with joy in him, presently her mouth was enlarged into a song of thanksgiving, 1 Sam. i. 13—15; ii. 1—10.

There is no phrase more usual in the Psalms, than to sing forth praises unto God; and it is not used without a special emphasis. For it is one thing to "praise," and another to "sing praises," Psal. cxlvi. 1, 2. This is, to publish, to declare, to speak of abundantly, to "abundantly utter the memory of" God's "great goodness," that "one generation may praise thy works to another, and declare thy mighty acts," Psal. cxlv. 4, 7. And therefore we find, in the most solemn thanksgivings, that the people of God were wont in great companies and with musical instruments to sound forth the praises of God, and to cause their joy to be heard after off, Neh. xii. 27, 43; Isa. xii. 4—6; Jer. xxxi. 7. This then is the force of the expression: Lord, when thou hast taken away iniquity, and extended thy grace and favour to us, we will not only have thankful hearts, every man to praise thee by himself; but we will have thankful lips to show forth thy praise, we will stir up and encourage one another, we will tell our children, and the generations to come may know the mercy of our God.

This is a great part of the communion of saints, to join together in God's praises. There is a communion of sinners, wherein they combine together to dishonour God, and encourage one another in evil, Psal. lxxiv. 5; lxxxiii. 5—8; Prov. i. 10, 11. Eve was no sooner caught herself, but she became a kind of serpent, to deceive and to catch her husband. A tempter has no sooner made a sinner, but that sinner will become a tempter. As, therefore, God's enemies hold communion to dishonour him; so great reason there is that his servants should hold communion to praise him, and to animate and excite one another to duty, as men that draw at an anchor, and soldiers that set upon a service, are wont to do with mutual encouragements, Isa. ii. 3; Zech. viii. 21; Mal. iii. 16. The holy oil for the sanctuary was made of many spices compounded by the art of the perfumer, Exod. xxx. 23—25, to note unto us that those duties are sweetest which are made up in a communion of saints, each one contributing to them his influence: as in winds and rivers, where many meet in one they are strongest; and in chains and jewels, where many links and stones are joined in one they are richest. All good is diffusive, like leaven in a lump, like sap in a root; it will find the way from the heart to every faculty of soul and body, and from thence to the ears and hearts of others. Every living creature was made with the seed of life in it, to preserve itself by multiplying, Gen. i. 11, 12. And of all seeds, that of the Spirit is most vigorous; and in nothing so much as in glorifying God, when the joy of the Lord, which is our strength, puts itself forth to derive the praises of his name, and to call in others to their celebration, 1 John iii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 23.

From all which we learn some means, amongst many others, whereby to try the truth of our conversion. 1. By the life and workings of true thankfulness to God for pardon of sin, and acceptance into favour. Certainly, when a man is converted himself, his heart will be enlarged, and his mouth will be filled with the praises of the Lord; he will acquaint others to what a good God he is turned. If he have found Christ himself, as Andrew and Philip, and the woman of Samaria did, he will presently report it to others, and invite them to come and see, John i. 41, 46; iv. 29. If Zaccheus be converted, he receives Christ joyfully, Luke xix. 6. If Matthew be converted, he entertains him with a feast, Luke v. 29. If Cornelius be instructed in the knowledge of him, he will call "his kinsmen and near friends" to partake of such a banquet, Acts x. 24. If David be converted himself, he will endeavour that other sinners may be converted too, and will show them what the Lord has done for his soul, Psal. li. 13. The turning of a sinner from evil to good, is like the turning of a bell from one side to another; you cannot turn it but it will make a sound, and report its own motion. He that has not a mouth open to report the glory of God's mercy to his soul, and to strengthen and edify his brethren, may justly question the truth of his own conversion. In Aaron's garments (which were types of holiness) there were to be golden bells and pomegranates, which (if we may make any allegorical application of it) intimates to us, that as a holy life is fruitful and active in the duties of spiritual obedience, so it is loud and vocal in sounding forth the praises of God, and thereby endeavouring to edify the church. Gideon's lamps and pitchers were accompanied with trumpets: when God is pleased to put any light of

Apud poetas elativissimos laudes De-orum inter regalia convivia canebantur.
Quintil. lib. 1.
cap. 10. See also verba laudes in conviviis Christianorum. Tertull.
Apolog. cap. 9.
Cyprian. lib. 2.
sect. 2.

grace into these earthen vessels of ours, we should have months full of thankfulness to return to him the glory of his goodness.

And as that repentance is unsound which is not accompanied with thankfulness, so that thankfulness is but empty and hypocritical which does not spring out of sound repentance. We are wont to say that the words of fools are in labris nata, born in their lips; but the words of wise men are e sulco pectoris, drawn up out of an inward judgment. "The calves of the lips" are no better than the "calves of the stall" in God's account, if they have not a heart in them. Without this the promise here made to God would be no other than that with which nurses deceive their little children, when they promise them a gay golden new-nothing. Praise in the mouth without repentance in the heart, is like a sea-weed that grows without a root; like the pouring of balm and spices upon a dead body, which can never thoroughly secure it from putrefaction; like a perfume about one sick of the plague, whose sweet smell carries infection along with it.

It is not the mentioning of mercies, but the improving of them to piety, which expresses our thankfulness to God. God sets every blessing upon our score, and expects an answer and return suitable. He compares Chorazin and Bethsaida with Tyre and Sidon; and if their lives be as bad as these, their punishment shall be much heavier, because the mercies they enjoyed were much greater. The not rightly using mercies is being unthankful for them. And it is a heavy account which men must give for abused mercies, Deut. xxxii. 6; Amos ii. 9—16; Luke xiii. 7; Heb. vi. 7, 8. Sins against mercy, and under mercy, are "the first-ripe fruit;" when the sun shines hottest, the fruits ripen fastest, Amos viii. 1, 2; Jer. i. 11, 12. God does not bear so long with the provocations of a church, as of those that are not a people; the sins of the Amorites were longer in ripening than the sins of Israel. When judgment is abroad, it will begin at the house of God.

2. But further, we should be so much the more earnestly pressed to this, by how much it is the greater evidence of our conversion unto God, and by how much more apt we are to call for mercies when we want them, than with the leper to return praises when we enjoy them. Ten cried to be healed, but there was but one that returned glory to God, Luke xvii. 11—19. Vessels will sound when they are empty; fill them, and they are presently dumb. When we want mercies, then with Pharaoh we cry out for pardon, for peace, for supplies, for deliverances; but when prayers are answered, and our turn served, how few remember the method which God prescribes, "Call on me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me," Psal. i. 15; yea, how many, like swine, trample on the meat that feeds them, and tread under foot the mercies that preserve them! How many are so greedily intent upon the things they desire, that they can neither see nor value the things they enjoy! Omnis festinatio cæca est. It is noted even of good king Hezekiah, that he "rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him," 2 Chron. xxxii. 25. Therefore we should be exhorted in our prayers for pardon and grace, to do as the church here does, to promise the sacrifices of thankfulness and obedience, not as a price to purchase mercy, (for our good extends not to God, Psal. xvi. 2.) but as a tie and obligation upon ourselves, to acknowledge and return the praise of mercy to him that gives it. And to this the apostle exhorts us, "Let your requests be made known unto God," not only "by prayer and supplication," but "with thanksgiving," Phil. iv. 6;

Dieta factis deficientibus cruescunt.
Tertul. de Patra, cap. 1.

Μία ψυχοῦν κρη-νῶν αὐτῶν τὰ ἄρθρα αὐτῶν ὡς ἄρθρα τοῦ οὐροῦ. Clem.
Alex. Strom. 1. 7.
Deum colit, quin-que imitatus est.
Senec. Epist. 65.

Seneca de Benefic.
l. 3. c. 3. Liv. lib.
22.

1 Thess. v. 17, 18; 1 Tim. ii. 1; which we find to have been his own practice, Eph. iii. 14—21. We should keep a catalogue of God's mercies to quicken us to duty, as well as a catalogue of our own sins to make us cry for mercy. And to this duty of thanksgiving we may be excited by the consideration of,

I. God's greatness. "Great is the Lord, and" therefore "greatly to be praised," Psal. cxlv. 3. The praises of God should be according to his name, Psal. xlviii. 10; xevi. 8. All things were made for no other end, but to return glory to him who made them. Because all things are "of him," therefore all must be "to him," Rom. xi. 36. And this the very figure of the world teaches us. For a circular line ends where it began, and returns back into its original point, by that means strengthening and preserving itself. For things are usually strongest when nearest their original, and the more remote from that, the weaker they grow; as a tree is strongest at the root, and a branch or bough next the trunk or stock, and the further out from thence, the smaller and weaker it grows; and the further it is from the original of its being, the nearer it is to not being. So all creatures are hereby taught, both for the preservation of that being which they have, and for the supply of those perfections which they want, as well as for the setting forth of the greatness of their Maker, (out of whose infinite being all finite beings are sustained and perfected,) to run back to God, for whose sake they are, and have been created. Rivers come from the sea, and therefore run back into the sea again; the trees receive sap from the earth, and within a while pay it back in those leaves that fall down to the earth again. Now as God has made all creatures thus to show forth the glory of his greatness, so he will have them do it by those principles, and in that manner of working, which he has planted in them. Inanimate and mere natural creatures are bid to praise the Lord, Psal. cxlviii. 8, 9; but this they do blindly and ignorantly, like the arrow which flies toward the mark, but understands not its own destination, being directed thither by an understanding without and above itself. And thus when any thing by the natural weight and inclination of its own form moves to the place where it may be preserved, or draws to it those further degrees of perfection whereby it may be improved, and have more of being communicated to it, it may truly be said to praise the Lord, in that it obeys the law which he planted in it, and is by his wise providence carried back towards him, to derive its conservation and perfection from the same fountain from whence proceeded its being. But now, reasonable creatures being by God enriched with internal knowledge, and that knowledge in his church exceedingly raised by his manifestation of himself in the word as their uttermost blessedness, he therefore requires that we should work actively, and with intention of the end for which he made us, guiding all our aims and inclinations towards his glory by that internal knowledge of his excellency which he has implanted in us, and revealed to us. And indeed all other creatures are in this sense said to glorify God, because the infinite power, wisdom, goodness, and perfection of God which are in their beings and workings so notably reluctant, do become the object of reasonable creatures, to contemplate upon, and by that means draw forth admiration and adoration of him.

II. God's goodness. He deserves it at our hands. He gives more to us than we are able to render unto him. The sun shines on the moon with its own glorious light; the moon returns but a faint and spotted light upon the world. We can return nothing to God but that which is his own, 1 Chron. xxix. 16, and it is returned from us not with that purity with which it came to us. We cannot send forth a thought round about us, but it will return with a report of mercy, and that mercy calls for a return of praise. But above all, the goodness of God mentioned in the text, "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously," this calls for "the calves of the lips" to be offered, as in the new moons, with trumpets and solemnity, Numb. x. 10. The beams of the sun, the more directly they fall on the body of the moon, fill it with the more abundant light; so the more copious and remarkable God's mercies are to us, the more enlarged unto him should be our praises. Therefore true penitents that have more tasted of mercy, are more obliged to thanksgiving, Psal. cxlvii. 20. "Excellent speech becometh not a fool," Prov. xvii. 7; but "praise is comely for the upright," Psal. xxxiii. 1. For as God is most dishonoured by the sins of holy men when they are committed against light, and break forth into scandal, 2 Sam. xii. 14, so is he most honoured by the confession and praises of holy men, because they know more of his glory and

Preliosam vestem
exquis quæris maculæ turpis decoratur. Nobis ad immunditiam mini-mæ quæris inoledimenta sufficit, &c.
Bernard. ser. de Trijulicæ Custodis.

goodness than others, and can report greater things of him. Wicked men speak of God by hear-say, and by notion only, but holy men by intimate experience; as the queen of Sheba knew more of Solomon's wisdom from his mouth than from his fame. He that sees but the outward court and buildings of a palace, can say it is a glorious place; but he that, like the ambassadors of the king of Babylon in Hezekiah's time, shall be admitted to see "the house of his precious things," and all the treasures of the palace, can speak much more honourably of it, 2 Kings xx. 12, 13. Every one might see and admire the stones of the temple without, who were not admitted to view the gold and curious workmanship within. The more intimate communion a man has with God as a Redeemer, the more glorious and abundant praises can he render unto him. Besides,

Et locus ubi vere quiescens et quietus cessatur Deus, locus eminus noo judicis, non magister, sed
opinio: sed hinc rara hora, et parva mora.
Is. ser. 25. in Cant.

praise is the language of heaven; the whole happiness of the saints there is to enjoy God, and their whole business is to praise him. And they who are to live in another country, will be more solicitous to learn the language, and fore-acquaint themselves with the manners and usages of that country, than they who have no hopes nor assurance of coming thither. As they who have hope to be like Christ in glory, will purify themselves, that they may in the mean time be like him in grace, 1 John iii. 2, 3; so they that have hope to praise him for ever in heaven, will "study the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb," before they come thither. And indeed none can praise God but they that can abase and deny themselves. Wicked men in all duties serve and seek themselves; but the very formality of praise is to seek God, and to make him the end of our so doing. The apostle exhorts us to offer ourselves "a living sacrifice," Rom. xii. 1; that is to say, to separate ourselves for God and for his uses. The sacrifice we know was God's, for his sake it was burnt, and broken, and destroyed. We must be such sacrifices; deny ourselves, be lost to ourselves, not serve, nor seek, nor aim at ourselves; but resolve to esteem nothing dear in comparison of God's honour, and to be willing any way, whether by life or by death, that he may be magnified in us, Acts xxi. 13; Phil. i. 20. Love of communion in natural creatures is stronger than self-love; stones will move upward, fire downward, to preserve the universe from a vacuity, and to keep the compages of nature together. How much more is, and ought to be, the love of God himself in the new creature stronger than self-love, whereby it seeks and serves itself! And without this all other services are but as Ananias's lie, lies to the Holy Ghost, keeping to ourselves what we would seem to bestow upon him. Lifting up the eyes, beating the breast, spreading the hands, bending the knee, hanging down the head, levelling the countenance, sighing, sobbing, fasting, howling, all nothing else but mocking of God. And we may say of such men, as the emperor of him that sold the glasses for pearl, (though in a sadder sense,) Imposturam faciunt et patientur. They deceive God, and fail in his precepts, and they shall be themselves deceived, and fail in their own expectations; for "the expectation of the wicked shall perish," Prov. x. 28.

III. By a consideration of ourselves, and that in a two-fold point of view. 1. Of our natural torpor and sluggishness to this duty. As the Dead Sea drinks in the river Jordan and is never the sweeter, and the ocean all other rivers and is never the fresher; so we are apt to receive daily mercies from God, and still remain insensible of them, and unthankful for them. God's mercies to us are like the dew on all the ground, our thanks to him like the dew on the fleece. We are like fishermen's wheels, wide at that end which lets in the fish, but narrow at the other end, so that they cannot get out again; greedy to get mercy, tenacious to hold it, but unthankful in acknowledging or right using it. The rain comes down from heaven in showers, it goes up but in mists. We sow in our land one measure, and receive ten; yea, Isaac received a hundred-fold, Gen. xxvi. 12; but God sows ten, it may be a hundred, mercies amongst us, when we scarce return the praise and the fruit of one. Our hearts in this case are like the windows of the temple, 1 Kings vi. 4, wide inward to let in mercies, but narrow outward to let forth praises. Now as husbandmen use, where the nature of land is more defective, to expend on it the more importunate labour; so, having hearts so earthly for the performance of so heavenly a duty, we should use the more holy violence upon them. And as the widow extorted justice from an unjust judge by her continual coming, Luke xviii. 5, we should press, and urge, and with ingeminated importunity charge this duty upon ourselves, as does the psalmist, "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" Psal. cvii. 8, 15, 21, 31. 2. Of our own benefit. For indeed all the benefit which arises out of this duty redounds to us, and none to God. His glory is infinite, and eternally the same, Ipsæ omnia. Tertull. contra Praxean, cap. 5. there neither is, nor can be, accession to that by all our praises. When a glass reflects the brightness of the sun, there is but an acknowledgment of what was, not any addition of what was not. When an excellent orator makes a panegyric oration in praise of some honourable person, he does not infuse any dram of worth into the person, but only sets forth and declares that which is to others. A curious picture praises a beautiful face, not by adding beauty to it, but by representing that which was in it before. The window which lets light into a house, does not benefit the light, but the house into which the light shines. So our praising of God serves to quicken, comfort, and refresh ourselves, who have interest in so good a God; or to edify and encourage our brethren, that they may be ambitious to serve so honourable a Master; but our praises add no lustre or glory whatever to God.

But further, the right performance of this duty is founded on the due apprehensions of God's being good, and of his doing good, Psal. cxix. 68; or on his excellency in himself, and his goodness towards us. In the former respect it consists in adoring and extolling the great name of God, ascribing in our hearts and mouths all blessedness unto him, acknowledging his infinite majesty in himself, and his sovereignty over us his poor creatures, Exod. xv. 11; Micah vii. 18; and so covering our faces, and abhorring ourselves in his sight, Isa. vi.; Job xlii. 5, 6; not daring to question any of his deep, absolute, and most unsearchable counsels; but because all things are of him, to acknowledge that all things ought to be for and to him, and are to be reduced to the ends of his glory, by the counsel of his own will, Rom. ix. 20, 21; xi. 33, 36; Matt. xi. 25, 26; Psal. cxxxv. 5, 6; Job ix. 12; Eph. i. 11. In the latter respect, as he is the God in whom we "live, and move, and have our being," and hope for our blessedness; so it imports, first, a glorying and rejoicing in him as our alone felicity, Psal. xxxiii. 1; Hab. iii. 18; Phil. iv. 4. Secondly, a choosing and preferring him above all other good things, making him our end and aim, in life, in death, in doing, in suffering, Rom. iv. 7, 8. Thirdly, a thankful acknowledgment of all his mercies, as most beneficial unto us, and most gratuitous and free in regard of him, 2 Sam. vii. 18; Lam. iii. 22, 23. Lastly, a constant endeavour of a holy life, so to bring forth fruit, to do the will of God, and to finish his work which he has set us, so to order our conversation aright before him, as that he may have ascribed to him the glory of his authority over the consciences of men, and of the power of his love shed abroad in their hearts; and that all that see our conversation may say, Doubtless, the God whom these men serve after so holy a manner, for whom they despise all outward and sinful pleasures, is a holy and blessed God, infinitely able to comfort, satisfy, and reward all those that so conscientiously and constantly give up themselves to him, John xv. 8; xvii. 4; Psal. l. 23; Deut. iv. 6, 7; Matt. v. 16; 2 Cor. ix. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 12.

The second particular in their covenant is, amendment of life, and a more special care against those sins of carnal confidence, and spiritual adultery, whereby they had formerly dishonoured and provoked God. From whence there are two observations which offer themselves.

Obs. 1. True repentance and sound conversion, as it makes a man thankful for the pardon of sin past, so it makes him careful against the practice of sin for the time to come, especially those particular sins whereby he had formerly most dishonoured God, and defiled his own conscience. This doctrine consists of two parts, which we will consider asunder.

And first, of this care and purpose of amendment in general. When the poor converts who had been guilty of the most precious and innocent blood that ever was shed, began to be convinced of that horrible sin, and found those nails wherewith they had fastened the Lord of glory to a cross, pricking and piercing their own hearts, with what bleeding and relenting affections did they mourn over him! with what earnest importunities did they inquire after the way of salvation wherein they might serve and enjoy him! never were their hands more cruel in shedding that blood, than their hearts were now solicitous to be bathed in it, to be cleansed by it, Acts ii. 37. The poor prodigal, who is the emblem of a penitent sinner, when he came to himself again, or bethought himself, as the phrase is, 1 Kings viii. 47, (for we do never depart from God, but we do withal forsake and lose ourselves, and are transported with a spiritual madness from our right minds,) immediately grew to a resolution of arising out of that base and brutish condition, and of going home to his father, and by that means to his wit and senses again. So when, by John's preaching of repentance, men were turned to the wisdom of the just, (for all unrighteousness is folly and madness,) and were prepared for the Lord, we immediately find what a special care they had to be informed in the ways of duty, earnestly inquiring after that new course of obedience in which they were now to walk. Luke iii. 10, 12, 14. All true penitents are of the same mind with these in the text, "Neither will we say any more," and, "What have I to do any more with idols?" ver. 8; as Ezra in his penitent prayer, "Should we again break thy commandments?" chap. ix. 13, 14. "Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more;" and when we repent of sin, it must be with a repentance "not to be repented of;" Rom. vi. 9, 12; 2 Cor. vii. 10. "The time past of our life must suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles," 1 Pet. iv. 3.

This care arises from the nature of true repentance, which has two names usually given it. 1. Μετάνοια, a change of the mind; the heart is framed to have other and truer notions of sin, of grace, of heaven, of hell, of conscience, of salvation, than it had before; for the mind of wicked men being defiled, they can frame to themselves none but impure apprehensions of spiritual things, as a yellow eye sees every thing yellow, and a bitter palate imparts to every thing its bitterness. 2. Μεταπέθεια, a change of the cares and endeavours of life; that whereas before a man made provision for the flesh, and his study and care was how to satisfy the lusts of his own heart, Rom. xiii. 14, what he should eat, what he should drink, wherewith he should be clothed; now his care is how he may be saved, how he may honour and enjoy God, Acts ii. 37; xvi. 30. The first question in repentance is, "What have I done?" Jer. xviii. 6; and the next question is, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Acts ix. 6. And this care repentance works,

1. By a godly sorrow for sin past. It brings into a man's remembrance the history of his former life; makes him with heaviness of spirit recount the guilt of so many innumerable sins, wherewith he had bound himself as with chains of darkness; the loss of so much precious time mispent in the service of such a master as had no other wages to give but shame and death; the horrible indignities thereby offered to the majesty and justice of God; the odious contempt of his holy will and sovereign authority; the daring neglect of his threatenings, and undervaluing of his rewards; the high provocation of his jealousy and displeasure; the base corivally and contesting of sinful lusts with the grace of the gospel, and the precious blood of the Son of God; the gainsaying, and wrestling, and stubborn antipathy of a carnal heart to the pure motions of the Spirit, and word of Christ; the presumptuous repulses of him that stands at the door and knocks, waiting that he may be gracious; the long turning of his back, and thrusting away from him the word of reconciliation, wherein Christ by his ambassadors had so often besought him to be reconciled unto God: the remembrance of these things makes a man look with self-abhorrence on himself, and full detestation on his former courses. And he now no longer considers the silver or the gold, the profit or the pleasure of his wonted lusts, though they be never so delectable or desirable in the eye of flesh; he looks upon them as accursed things to be thrown away, as the converts did upon their costly and curious books, Acts xix. 19; Isa. xxx. 22; xxxi. 7. Sin is like a plaited picture: on the one side of it, to the impenitent, appears nothing but the beauty of pleasure, whereby it bewitches and allures them; on the other side, to the penitent, appears nothing but the horrid and ugly face of guilt and shame, whereby it amazes and confounds them. Thus the remembrance of sin past, (which they are very careful to keep always in their sight, Psal. li. 3,) does, by godly sorrow, work special care of amendment of life for the time to come, 2 Chron. vi. 37, 38; Psal. cxix. 59; Ezek. xvi. 61—63; xx. 43.

2. By a present sense of the weight and burden of remaining corruptions, which work, and move, and put forth what strength they can to resist the grace of God in us. As the time past wherein sin reigned, so the present burden of sin besetting us is esteemed sufficient, and makes a man careful not to load himself wilfully with more, being ready to sink, and forced to cry out under the pain of those which he unwillingly lies under already. * A very glutton, when he is in a fit of the gout, or stone, will forbear those meats which feed such painful diseases. A penitent sinner is continually in pain under the body of sin, and therefore dares not feed so dangerous and tormenting a disease. † The more spiritual any man is, the more painful and burdensome is corruption to him, Rom. vii. 24; for sin to the new man is as sickness to the natural man. The more exquisite and delicate the natural senses are, the more are they sensible and affected with that which offends nature. Contraries cannot co-exist without strife. The Spirit will just against the flesh, and not suffer a man to fulfil the lusts of it, Gal. v. 16, 17; the seed of God will keep down the strength of sin, 1 John iii. 9.

Πενήντη γάρ ἂν ὄρι ἰδέσθαι τιμωτέρα χυνοῦ τε καὶ ἄγχιου.
Acheilus Eretinus, apud Athen. lib. 6. cap. 20.

3. By a holy jealousy, and godly fear of the falseness and backsliding of our corrupt heart, lest, like Lot's wife, it should look back towards Sodom, and, like Israel, have a mind hankering after the flesh-pots of Egypt, the wonted profits and pleasures of forsaken lusts. A godly heart prizes the love of God, and the feelings of spiritual comfort from thence arising, above all other things, and is afraid to lose them. It has felt the burnings of sin, the stings of those fiery serpents, and has often been forced to befool itself, and to beshrew its own ignorance; and, with Ephraim, to smite upon the thigh. Like the burnt child, it dreads the fire, and dares not meddle any more with it; it considers the heaviness of God's frown, the rigour of his law, the weakness and fickleness of the heart of man, the difficulty of finding Christ out when he has withdrawn himself, and of recovering light and peace again, when the soul has wilfully brought itself under a cloud; therefore it will not venture to harden itself against God. Thus godly fear keeps men from sin, Job xxxi. 23; Psal. iv. 4; cxix. 120; Prov. xxviii. 14; Eccl. ix. 2; Jer. xxxii. 40; Phil. ii. 12.

4. By a love to Christ, and a sweet recounting of the mercies of God in him. The less a man loves sin the more will he love Christ. Now repentance works a hatred of sin, and thereupon a love of Christ; which love is ever operative, and putting forth itself towards holiness of life. As the love of God in Christ towards us works forgiveness of sin, so our reciprocal love, wrought by the feeling and comfort of that forgiveness, works in us a hatred of sin. A direct love begets a reflex love, as the heat wrought in the earth strikes back again a heat up into the air. The woman in the gospel having much forgiven her, "loved much," Luke vii. 47. "We love him because he first loved us;" and love will not suffer a man to wrong the thing which he loves. What man ever threw away jewels or money when he might have kept them? except when the predominant love of something better made these things comparatively hateful, Luke xiv. 26. What woman could be persuaded to throw away her sucking child from her breast to swine or dogs to devour it? Our love to Christ will not suffer us to cast him off, or to throw his law behind our backs. New obedience is ever joined to pardon of sin and repentance for it, by the method of God's decrees, by the order and chain of salvation, and arises out of the internal character and disposition of a child of God. We are not sons only by adoption, appointed to a new inheritance; but we are sons by regeneration also, partakers of a new nature, designed to a new life, joined to a new Head, descended from a new Adam, to whom therefore we are, in "the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings," to be "made conformable," Phil. iii. 10. The apostle uses many excellent and weighty arguments to enforce this upon us, Col. iii. 1—4: "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." 1. Our fellowship with Christ: we are "risen with" him; what he did corporally for us, he does the same spiritually in us. As a Saviour and Mediator, he died and rose alone; but as a Head and Second Adam, he never did anything but his mystical body and seed were so taken into the fellowship of it, as to be made conformable to it. Therefore if he rose as a Saviour to justify us, we must, as members, be therein fashioned unto him, and rise spiritually, by heavenly-mindedness and a new life, to glorify him. 2. We must have our affections in heaven, because Christ is there. The heart ever turns towards its treasure; where the body is, thither will the eagles resort. 3. He is there in glory at God's right hand; and grace should move attracted to glory, as the smaller particles of matter to the larger mass. And he is there on our business, making intercession in our behalf, providing a place for us, sending down gifts to us. And the client cannot but have his heart on his own business, when the advocate is actually stirring about it. 4. We are "dead" with Christ, as to the life of sin; and a dead man takes no thought or care for the things of that life from whence he is departed. A man naturally dead looks not after food, or raiment, or land, or money, or labour; and a man dead to sin takes no more care how to provide for it. 5. In Christ we have a new life, therefore we should have new inclinations suitable to it, and new provisions laid in for it. A natural man feeds on worldly things by sense, a spiritual man on heavenly things by faith and conscience. We can have nothing from the first Adam which is not mortal and mortiferous; nothing from the Second which is not eternal and life-giving. Whatever the one gives us shrinks and withers into death; whatever the other, springs and flourishes into immortal life. Our life, therefore, being new, the affections which serve it, and wait upon it, must be new likewise. 6. This life is our own; not so any thing in the world besides. I can purchase in the world only to me and mine heirs for ever, but spiritual purchases are to myself for ever. And every man's affections are naturally most fixed upon that which is most his own. 7. It is a hidden life, the best of it is yet unseen, 1 John iii. 2; and though the cabinet which is seen be rich, yet the jewel which is hidden in it is much richer. And as there is a sinful curiosity in lust to look after the hidden things of iniquity, and to hanker after forbidden pleasures, so there is a spiritual curiosity or ambition in grace, to aspire towards hidden treasures, to press forward towards things that are before us, "to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." As Absalom, being brought from banishment, longed to see the face of his father, 2 Sam. xiv. 32; so the soul, delivered out of the land of darkness, never thinks it sees enough of light. When God did most intimately reveal himself to Moses, Moses did most earnestly beseech him to show him his glory, Exod. xxxiii. 11, 18. The more sweetness we find in the first-fruits, in so much of Christ as is revealed to us, the more strong are our affections to the whole harvest, to that abundance of him which is hidden from us. A few clusters of grapes and bunches of figs will inflame the desire of enjoying that Canaan which abounds with them. 8. It is "hid with Christ," so hid as that we know where it is. "Hid," so that the enemy cannot reach it, but not hid from the faith of the child. 9. It is hid "in God." It is life in the fountain, Psal. xxxvi. 9. Every thing is most perfect in its original source, and this is such a fountain of life as has in it fulness without satiety, purity without defilement, perpetuity without decay, and all-sufficiency without defect. Lastly, it is but hid, it is not lost; hid like seed in the ground; "when Christ," "the Sun of righteousness," "shall appear," this life of ours in him will spring up and appear glorious.

* Εἰ ποῖς μεθασκομένοις ἰκίστατος ἡμῶν ἀγαθῶν συνίβαινε τὴν κεφαλὴν πρὸ τοῦ πιεῖν τὸν ἀκρατὸν, ἡμῶν οὐδὲ ἐστὶν ἄν. Clearch. apud Athen. l. II. c. 1.

† Conflictus miserabilis. Aug. de Nupt. et Concupis. l. 2. c. 1. Quo quis pejus se habet, minus sentit. Senec. Epist. 52.

Now, next let us consider this care of repentance against a man's own more particular and special sins. "Asshur shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses: neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods." Israel had been guilty of very many provocations, but when they came to covenant with God, and to renew their repentance, their thoughts and cares are most set against their carnal confidence and spiritual adultery; their most unfeigned detestations, their most serious resolutions, were against these their most proper sins. True repentance works indeed a general hatred of "every false way," Psal. cxix. 128, and suffers not a man to allow himself in the smallest sin. Yet, as the dog in hunting the deer, though he drive the whole herd before him, yet fixes his eye and scent on some one in particular, which is singled out by the dart of the huntsman; so, though sound conversion do work a universal hatred of all sin, because it is sin, (for hatred is ever against the whole kind of a thing,) though every member of the old man be mortified, and every grace of the new man shaped and fashioned in us, yet the severest exercise of that hatred is against the sins to which the conscience has been more enslaved, and by which the name of God has been more dishonoured. A man that has many wounds, if there be any of them more deep, dangerous, or nearer any vital part, than another, though he will tend the cure of them all, yet his chiefest care shall be towards that. As the king of Syria gave command to his army to single out the king of Israel in the battle, 1 Kings xxii. 31, so does repentance lay its batteries most against the highest, and strongest, and most reigning sin of the heart; and by how much the more a man prized it before, by so much the more does he detest it now. Before they counted no silver nor gold too good to frame their idols of, their ear-rings shall go to make them a calf, Exod. xxxii. 3; but when they repent, nothing can be too base to compare them, or to cast them unto, Isa. ii. 20; xxx. 22.

Human nature is the same in all men, yet some faculties are more vigorous in some, and others in others; some witty, others strong; some beautiful, others proper; some have a quick eye, others a ready tongue; some for learned, others for mechanical professions; as some grounds take better to some kind of grain than to others: so in the new man, though all the graces of Christ are in some degree and proportion shaped in every regenerate person, yet one excels in one grace, another in another: Abraham in faith, Job in patience, Moses in meekness, David in meditation, Solomon in wisdom, Phinehas in zeal, Mary Magdalene in love,

Paul in labour. And so is it in the old man too: though by nature we have all the members of original corruption, yet these put themselves forth in actual vigour differently. One man is more possessed by a proud devil, another by an unclean one: Ahaz superstitious, Balaam ambitious, Cain envious, Korah stubborn, Esau profane, Ishmael a mocker, the young man a worldling, Mark x. 22. According to different complexions and tempers of body, (by which habitual lust is excited and called forth into act,) or according to differences of education, countries, callings, converse, and interests in the world, so men are differently assaulted with distinct kinds of sin; and most men have their peccatum in deliciis, which they may more properly call their own, Psal. xviii. 23. And as this sin is usually the special bar and obstacle that keeps men from Christ, as we see in the example of the young man, Mark x. 22, and of the Jews, John v. 44; xii. 42, 43; so when Christ has broken this obstacle, and gotten the throne in a man's heart, then the chief work of repentance is to keep this sin from gathering strength again: for as they say of some kind of serpents, that, being cut in pieces, the parts will wriggle towards one another, and close and get life again; so, of all sins, a man is in most danger of the reviving of his own proper corruption, as being like the nettle, whose roots are so crooked, are so catching to the ground, that it is a work of much care to keep the ground clean of them after they are weeded out.

And therefore repentance sets itself particularly against that sin, as a special argument of sincerity. "I was also upright" (saith David) "before him, and I kept myself from mine iniquity," Psal. xviii. 23. And "he that is begotten of God" (saith the apostle) "keepeth himself," 1 John v. 18; which he does certainly with most vigilance there, where he is in most danger of being assaulted. Thus David had, in that great and scandalous fall of his, stained his conscience with impure lust, with the guilt of blood; and that not out of ignorance, or common infirmity, or sudden passion and surprisal of some hasty temptation, (which might haply have consisted with uprightness,) but seriously, and deliberately, using many cunning arts and carnal shifts of sinful wisdom to colour and damb it over; and further, by this means had given a great blow to the holy name of God, and caused his enemies to blaspheme, as Nathan tells him, 2 Sam. xii. 14: therefore, in his penitential psalm, these four things he principally insists upon, "a clean heart," deliverance from "blood-guiltiness," "truth in the inward parts," and opportunity to "teach transgressors" the way of God, that they may be converted. Psal. li. 6, 10, 13, 14. Thus Zaccheus; worldliness and defrauding had been his sin, restitution and liberality are the evidences of his repentance in special for that sin, Luke xix. 8. So Mary Magdalene: her sin had been uncleanness, her eyes vessels and factors for adultery, her hair a net platted and spread to catch sinners; she remembered her wanton kisses, her provoking perfumes: and now in her conversion, where her sin had been most prevalent, there her sorrow was most penitent, and her repentance most vigilant; her eyes vessels of tears, her kisses humbled, or rather advanced to the feet of Christ; her hair a towel to wipe off those tears which she judged too unclean to wash such holy feet; her ointment poured out upon a new Lover, who had anointed her with his grace, Luke vii. 37, 38. The sin of the jailer against Paul and Silas was cruelty, and the first-fruit of his repentance was courtesy; he "brought them out" of a dungeon into his own house, from the stocks to his table, became an host instead of a jailer, a surgeon instead of a tormentor, and "washed their stripes," Acts xvi. 19—34. This was Daniel's method of working repentance in Nebuchadnezzar, persuading a proud, oppressing tyrant to justice and mercy, Dan. iv. 27; and Paul's with Felix, preaching before a corrupt and lascivious judge of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," Acts xxv. 25; and with the learned and superstitious philosophers, in a learned discovery, making known to them their "unknown God," Acts xvii. 23. So John, the preacher of repent-

In rotem prato bos herbam quatit, et nis leporem, et laeratum. Senec.
Ep. 108.

ance, laid his axe to the root of every tree, to the radical and prevailing lust in every order of men; to extortion in the publican, and to covetousness in the people, to violence in the soldiers, to carnal confidence in the Pharisees, Matt. iii. 7; Luke iii. 9—14. And so Christ with the young man, "One thing thou lackest," Mark x. 21; and to the woman of Samaria, "Go, call thy husband," John iv. 16, when indeed he was an adulterer, and not a husband.

The reason of this cure of repentance is, 1. Because in godly sorrow this sin has lain most heavy upon the conscience. Hereby God has been most of all despised and dishonoured, our consciences most wasted and defiled, our hearts most hardened, our affections most bewitched and entangled. It has been a master-sin, that has been able to command and to draw in many other servile lusts to wait upon it. Many wounds, even after they have been healed, will on change of weather affect the part wherein they were with acute pains; and therefore men usually are more tender of that part, and keep it warmer: as the apostle saith, that on our dishonourable parts we bestow the more abundant honour; so, on such an infirm and tender part, we bestow the more abundant care; and the like do we in those wounds of the soul which are most apt to bleed afresh.

2. Hereby (as was said before) we testify our uprightness. When we will not spare our beloved sin, nor roll it under our tongue, nor hide it in our tent; when we will not muffle nor disguise ourselves like Tamar, nor hide amongst the bushes and trees like Adam, or in the belly of the ship with Jonah, nor spare any wedge of gold with Achan, or any delicate Agag, any fatling sins, with Saul; but with David will show that we "hate every false way," by throwing the first stone at our first sin, that which lay nearest and closest to our bosoms, which the Scripture calls cutting off the right hand, and plucking out the right eye, Matt. v. 29, 30; as Cranmer put that hand first into the fire, with which he had before subscribed to save his life. The story of the Turkish emperor is commonly known, who being reported so to dote on one of his concubines, as for love of her to neglect the affairs of his kingdom, caused her to be brought forth in great pomp, and cut off her head before his bashaws, to assure them that nothing was so dear to him but that he could willingly part from it to attend the public welfare. This was an act of cruelty in him, but the like is an act of penitence in us, when we can sacrifice the dearest affections wherewith we served sin. Let Christ kill our Agag, though delicately appareled, and divide the richest of all our spoils. If we be learned, we shall direct all our studies to the fear of God, Eccl. xii. 12, 13. If rich, we shall lay up a foundation of good works against the time to come, and consecrate our merchandise as holy to the Lord, 1 Tim. vi. 18, 19; Isa. xxiii. 18. If wise, if honourable, if powerful, if adorned with any endowment, our business will be, with Bezaleel and Aholiab, to adorn the gospel with them all; from our gold to our goats' hair, to lay all out upon the sanctuary, Exod. xxxi.; to make those members and abilities which had been Satan's armour, and weapons of unrighteousness, to be now weapons of holiness, and dedicated unto Christ, Rom. vi. 19. This is the holy revenge which "godly sorrow" takes upon sin, 2 Cor. vii. 10, 11.

If many men who profess repentance, and think they are already long ago converted unto God, would examine the truth of their conversion by this touchstone, it would minister matter of much humiliation and fear to them, when their own heart would reply against them as Samuel against Saul; Hast thou indeed, as thou professest, done the work of the Lord in destroying Amalek, "what meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which

I hear?" what mean these worldly and covetous practices, these lascivious or revengeful speeches, these carthy, sensual, or ambitious lusts? are these Agags spared and kept delicately, and canst thou please thyself in the thoughts of a sound repentance? Did Paul fear that his God would "humble" him for those that had not repented amongst the Corinthians, because there were envyings, strifes, and debates amongst them? 2 Cor. xii. 20, 21; and wilt thou presume on thy repentance, and not be humbled when thou findest the same things in thyself? Hast thou never yet proclaimed defiance to thy beloved sin? made it the mark of thy greatest sorrows, of thy strongest prayers and complaints unto God? Hast thou never stirred up a holy indignation and revenge against it? and above all things, taken off thy thoughts from the meditation and love of it? and found pleasure in the holy severity of God's book and the ministry thereof against it? made no covenant with thine eye, put no knife to thy throat, set no door before thy lips, made no friends of unrighteous mammon? Dost thou still retain hankering affections after thy wonted delights, as Lot's wife after Sodom? and are the flesh-pots of Egypt desirable in thy thoughts still? "Be not high-minded, but fear." There is no greater argument of an unsound repentance than indulgent thoughts, and reserved delight and complacency in a master-sin. The devil will diligently observe and hastily catch one kind glance of this nature, (as Ben-hadad's servants did, 1 Kings xx. 33,) and make use of it to do us mischief. David had been free from some of his greatest troubles, if he had not relented towards Absalom, and called him home from banishment; he no sooner kissed Absalom, than Absalom courted and kissed the people to steal their hearts away from him. As there are in points of faith fundamental articles, so there are in points of practice fundamental duties. And amongst them none more primary, and essential to true Christians, than self-denial, Matt. xvi. 24; and this is one special part and branch of self-denial, to keep ourselves from our own iniquity, and to say to our most costly and darling lusts, Get ye hence. Asshur away, idols away, I will rather be fatherless than rely upon such helpers.

Obs. 5. True repentance and conversion take off the heart from all carnal confidence, either in domestic preparations of our own, "we will not ride upon horses;" or in foreign aid from any confederates, especially enemies of God and his church, though otherwise never so potent, "Asshur shall not save us;" or, lastly, in any superstitious and corrupt worship, which sends us to God the wrong way, "neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods;" and causes the soul in all conditions, be they never so desperate, so desolate, so incurable, to rely only upon God. It is very much in the nature of man fallen, to affect an absoluteness and a self-sufficiency, to seek the good that he desires within himself, and to derive from himself the strength whereby he would repel any evil which he fears. This staying within itself, reflecting upon its own power and wisdom, and by consequence affecting an independence of any superior virtue in being and working, making itself the first cause and the last end of its own motions; is by divines conceived to have been the first sin by which the creature fell from God, and it was the first temptation by which Satan prevailed to draw man from God too. For since next to God every reasonable created being is nearest to itself, we cannot conceive how it should turn from God, and not in the next step turn to itself; and by consequence, whatsoever it was in a regular dependence to have derived from God, being fallen from him, it does by an irregular dependence seek for from itself. Hence it is that men of power are apt to

Vol. Aug. de Civit.
Dei, lib. 2. c. 1.
Aquilin. part. 1. Q. 63.
Art. 3. Hooker, B. I.
sect. 4.

deify their own strength, and to rane opinions of absoluteness to themselves, and to deride the thoughts of any power above them, as Pharaoh, Exod. v. 2, and Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 8, 10, 44, and Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iii. 15, and Sennacherib, 2 Kings xviii. 33—35; Isa. x. 8—14: men of wisdom, to deify their own reason, and to deride any thing that is above or against their own conceptions, as Tyrus, Ezek. xxviii. 2, 6, and the Pharisees, Luke xvi. 14; John vii. 48—52; Acts iv. 11; Isa. xlix. 7; liii. 3, and the philosophers, Acts xvii. 18, 32; 1 Cor. i. 22, 23: and men of morality and virtue, to deify their own righteousness, to rely on their own merits and performances, and to deride righteousness imputed and precarious, as the Jews, Rom. x. 3, and Paul before his conversion, Rom. vii. 9; Phil. iii. 6, 9. Thus natural is it for a sinful creature, who seeks only himself, and makes himself the last end, to seek only to himself, and to make himself the first cause and mover towards that end.

But because God will not give his glory to another, nor suffer any creature to encroach on his prerogative, or to sit down in his throne, he has therefore always blasted the policies and attempts of those who have aspired to such absoluteness and independency, making them know in the end that they are "but men," Psal. ix. 19, 20, and that the Most High ruleth over all; and that it is an enterprise more full of folly than it is of pride, for any creature to attempt to work its own safety and felicity out of itself. And as men usually are most vigilant upon their immediate interests, and most jealous and active against all encroachments thereupon; so we shall ever find that God singles out no men to be such notable monuments of his justice and their own ruin and folly, as those who have vied with him in the points of power, wisdom, and other Divine prerogatives, aspiring unto that absoluteness, self-sufficiency, self-interest, and independency which belong unto him only. And as he has by the destruction of Pharaoh, Sennacherib, Herod, and divers others, taught us the madness of this ambition; so does he by our own daily preservation teach us the same. For if God has appointed that we should go out of ourselves to things below us for a vital subsistence, to bread for food, to house for harbour, to clothes for warmth, much more has he appointed that we should go out of ourselves for a blessed and happy subsistence, by how much the more is required for blessedness than for life, and by how much the greater is our impotency to the greatest and highest end.

Yet so desperate is the aversion of sinful man from God, that when he is convinced of his impotency, and driven off from self-dependence, and reduced to such extremities as should in reason lead him back unto God, yet when he has no horses of his own to ride upon, no means of his own whereby to escape evil, he will still betake himself unto creatures like himself, though they be enemies to God, and enemies to him too for God's sake (for so was the Assyrian to Israel): "When Ephraim saw his sickness, and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb," Hos. v. 13. If he must beg, he will do it rather of an enemy than of God, yea, though he dissuade him from it, and threaten him for it. Ahaz would not believe though a sign were offered him, nor be persuaded to trust in God to deliver him from Rezin and Pekah though he promised him to do it; but under pretence of not tempting God in the use of means, will weary God with his provocation, and rob God to pay the Assyrian, who was not a help but a distress to him, 2 Kings xvi. 5, 8, 17, 18; 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21; Isa. vii. 8, 13; xxx. 5.

Well, God is oftentimes pleased to waylay human counsels, even in this case too, and so to strip them, not only of their own provisions, but of their foreign succours and supplies, so that they have no refuge left but unto him. Their horses fail them, their Assyrian fails them, Hos. vii. 11, 12; viii. 9, 10. Their hope has nothing either sub ratione boni, as really good to comfort them at home; or sub ratione auxilii, as matter of help and aid to support them from abroad. They are brought as Israel into a wilderness, where they are constrained to go to God, because they have no second causes to help them. And yet even here, wicked men will make a shift to keep off from God, when they have nothing in the world to turn to. This is the formal and intimate malignity of sin, to decline God, and to be impatient of him, in his own way. If wicked men be necessitated to implore help from God, they will invent ways of their own to do it. If horses fail, and Asshur fail, and Israel must go to God whether he will or no, it shall not be to the God that made him, but to a god of his own making; and when they have most need of their glory, they will change it into that which cannot profit, Jer. ii. 11. Thus foolish was Jeroboam, as to think his kingdom should be established by two calves at Dan and Beth-el, and by that means rooted out his own family, and at last ruined the kingdom, 1 Kings xii. 28, 29; xiv. 10, 15; 2 Kings xvii. 21—23; Hos. viii. 4, 5; x. 5, 8, 15. Thus foolish was Ahaz, to seek help of those gods which were the ruin of him and of all Israel, 2 Chron. xxviii. 23. Such a strong antipathy and averseness there is in the soul of natural men to God, as that when they are in distress they go to him last of all; they never think of him so long as their own strength and their foreign confederacies hold out, and when at last they are driven to him, they know not how to hold communion with him in his own way, but frame carnal and superstitious modes of worship to themselves, and so in their very seeking him provoke him to forsake them; and the very things whereon they lean, go up into their hand to pierce it, Isa. xv. 2; xvi. 12.

Now then the proper work of true repentance being to turn a man the right way to God, it takes a man off from all this carnal and superstitious confidence, and directs the soul in the greatest difficulties to east itself with comfort and confidence upon God alone. So it is prophesied of the remnant of God's people, that is, the penitent part of them, (for the remnant are those that came up "with weeping and supplications," seeking "the Lord their God," and asking "the way to Zion with their faces thitherward," Jer. xxxi. 9; l. 4, 5,) that they should "no more again stay" themselves "upon him that smote them," but should "stay upon the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, in truth," and should "return unto the mighty God," Isa. x. 20, 21. They resolve the Lord shall save them, and not the Assyrian. So say the godly in the psalmist, "An horse is a vain thing for safety; neither shall he deliver any by his great strength." "Our soul waiteth for the Lord: he is our help and shield," Psal. xxxiii. 17, 20. They will not say any more, "We will flee upon horses, we will ride upon the swift," Isa. xxx. 16. "At that day," saith the prophet, speaking of the penitent remnant, the gleanings of Jacob, "shall a man look to his Maker, and his eyes shall have respect to the Holy One of Israel. And he shall not look to the altars, the work of his hands, neither shall respect that which his fingers have made, either the groves, or the images," Isa. xvii. 7, 8. And again, "Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains," that is, from the idols (which they had set up and worshipped in high places): "truly in the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel," Jer. iii. 23. "Neither will we say any more to the work of our hands, Ye are our gods."

Ex arbitrio, non ex imperio. Tertul. cont. Psychic. cap. 13.

So then, the plain duties enjoined in the latter part of these verses are these :

1. To trust in God, who is all-sufficient to help ; who is Jehovah, the Fountain of being, and can give being to any promise, to any mercy which he intends for his people ; can not only work, but command ; not only command, but create deliverance, and fetch it out of darkness and desolation : he has " everlasting strength ;" there is no time, no case, no condition, wherein his help is not at hand, whenever he shall command it, Isa. xxvi. 4.

2. Not to trust in any creature. 1. Not in Asshur, in any confederacy or combination with God's enemies, be they otherwise never so potent. Jehoshaphat did so, and his " ships were broken," 2 Chron. xx. 35—37. Ahaz did so, and his people were distressed, 2 Chron. xxviii. 19—21. It is impossible for God's enemies to be cordial to God's people, so long as they continue cordial to their God. There is such an irreconcilable enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, that it is incredible to suppose that the enemies of the church will do any thing which may, per se, tend to the good of it, or that any end and design by them pursued can be severed from their own malignant interest. Let white be mingled with any other colour, and it loses its own beauty. It is not possible for God's people to join with any that are his enemies, and not lose thereby their own purity. He must be as wise and as potent as God, that can use the rage of God's enemies, and convert it, when he has done, to the good of God's church, and the glory of God's name, and be able at pleasure to restrain and call it in again. We must ever take heed of this dangerous competition between our own interests and God's : to be so tender and intent upon that, as to hazard and shake this. Jeroboam did so, but it was fatal to him, and to all Israel. The end of Judah's combining with the Assyrian was, that they might rejoice against Rezin and Remaliah's son ; but the consequence of it, which they never intended, was, that the Assyrian came up over all the channels, and over all the banks, and overflowed, and went over, and reached " even to the neck," and if it had not been Immanuel's land, would have endangered its destruction. If Israel for his own ends join with Asshur, it will hardly be possible for him in so doing, though against his own will, not to promote the ends of Asshur against God's church, and against God himself. And yet the prophet would not have, in that case, God's people to be dismayed, or to say, " A confederacy," " A confederacy ;" but to " sanctify the Lord of hosts himself," and make him their " fear," and their " dread," who will certainly be " a sanctuary" unto them, and will " bind up" his " testimony," and " seal the law among" his " disciples," when others shall " stumble, and fall, and be broken, and be snared, and be taken," Isa. viii. 6—18. If we preserve Emmanuel's right in us, and ours in him, all confederacies against us shall be broken, all counsels shall come to nought.

2. Not in horses, or in any other human preparations and provisions of our own. " Some trust in chariots, and some in horses : but we" (saith David) " will remember the name of the Lord our God," Psal. xx. 7. That name can do more with a sling and a stone, than Goliath with all his armour, 1 Sam. xvii. 45. It is " a strong tower" for protection and safety to all that flee into it, Prov. xviii. 10. Whereas horses, though they be " prepared against the day of battle," yet " safety is of the Lord," Prov. xxi. 31. Horses are " flesh, and not spirit," and their riders are " men, and not God ;" and cursed are they that make " flesh" their " arm," and depart from the Lord, Isa. xxxi. 1—3 ; Jer. xvii. 5. No, not in a variety of means and ways of help, which seems to be intimated in the word riding, from one confederate to another ; If Asshur fail, I will post to Egypt ; if one friend or counsel fail, I will make haste to another ; a sin very frequently charged upon Israel, Isa. xx. 5 ; lvii. 9 ; Jer. ii. 36, 37 ; Hos. vii. 11. These are not to be trusted in, 1. Because of the intrinsic weakness and defect of ability in the creature to help. Every man is a liar, either by imposture, and so in purpose ; or by impotency, and so in the event, deceiving those that rely upon him, Psal. lxxii. 9.

2. Because of the ignorance and defect of wisdom in us to apply that strength which is in the creature to the best advantage. None but an artificer can turn and govern the natural efficacy of fire, wind, water, to the works of art. The wisdom whereby we should direct created virtues to human ends is not in or of ourselves, but comes from God, Exod. xxxvi. 1, 2 ; Eccl. vii. 24 ; ix. 11 ; Isa. xxviii. 26—29 ; James i. 5.

3. Not in idols, not in corrupting the worship of God. Idols are lies, and teachers of lies, and promisers of lies to all that trust in them, Jer. x. 1—16 ; Hab. ii. 18 ; Rev. xxii. 15. An idol is just " nothing in the world," 1 Cor. viii. 4 ; and that which is nothing, can do nothing for those that rely upon it. Whatever a man trusts in, in time of trouble, must needs have these things in it to ground that confidence upon :

In idololatrá mendacium, cum tota substantia ejus mendax sit. Tert. de idololat. cap. 1. unde idololatris dicuntur αποκοραται την αληθειαν. Clem. Alex. in Protept. Ἰχθῆρον ἄδωρα ἄδωρα καὶ οἷα ὀφθαλμοῦ ὄψιμος. in Act. Το εὐαγγέλιον ἐστὶν τὸ πρῶτον φανερόν ἐστι. Plat. Απορρ.

1. A knowledge of him and his wants. Therefore we are bid to trust in God's providence over us for all outward good things, because he " knoweth" that we have " need" of them, Matt. vi. 32.

2. A loving and merciful disposition to help. A man may sometimes receive help from such as love him not, out of policy and in pursuance of other ends and designs ; but he cannot confidently rely upon any aid which is not first founded in love. I ever suspect and fear the gifts and succours which proceed from an enemy ; they will have their own ends only, even then when they seem to tender and serve me ; therefore David sings out God's mercy as the object of his trust, Psal. lii. 8.

3. A manifestation of that love in some promise or other, engaging to assist. For how can I with assurance, and without hesitancy, expect help there where I never received any promise of it ? Here was the ground of David's, Jehoshaphat's, Daniel's trust in God, the word and promise which he had passed to them, 1 Chron. xvii. 25—27 ; Psal. cxix. 42 ; 2 Chron. xx. 7 ; Dan. ix. 2.

4. Truth and fidelity in the care to make these promises good. This is that which makes us so confidently trust in God's promises, because we know they are all " yea and amen," that it is " impossible for God to lie," or deceive, or for any to " seek" his face " in vain," 2 Cor. i. 20 ; Josh. xxi. 45 ; Heb. vi. 18 ; Isa. xlv. 19.

5. Power to give being and effect to whatsoever is thus promised. That which a man leans upon, must have strength to bear the weight which is laid upon it. This is the great ground of our trusting in God at all times, even then when all other helps fail, because he is " I am," that can create and give a being to every thing which he has promised ; because " power belongeth unto" him, and " in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength," and nothing is " too hard," no help too great, for him who " made heaven and earth," and can command all the creatures which he made to serve those whom he is pleased to help, Psal. lxxii. 8, 11 ; Exod. iii. 14 ; Isa. xxvi. 4 ; Gen. xviii. 14 ; Jer. xxxii. 17 ; Psal. cxxi. 2 ; Matt. viii. 2. Now whosoever seeks for any of these grounds of trust in idols, shall be sure to be disappointed. Knowledge they have none, Isa. xliv. 9, and therefore love they have none, for how can that love any thing which knows nothing? Truth they have none, neither of being in themselves, nor of promise to those that trust in them; the very essence of an idol is to be a lie, to stand for that which it is not, and to present that to which it is most unlike, Isa. xl. 18; xlv. 20; Jer. x. 14—16. And power they have none, either to hear or save, Isa. xli. 23, 24, 28, 29; xlv. 20; xli. 7. And therefore that repentance which shakes off confidence in idols, not only converts a man to God, but to himself: it is not only an impious, but a sottish thing, and below the reason of a man, first to make a thing, and then to worship it, to expect safety from that which received being from himself, Isa. xli. 6, 7. These are the three great props of carnal confidence, foreign interests, domestic treasures, superstitious devotions: when men "please themselves in the children of strangers," and have their land "full of silver and gold," and "treasures," full of "horses" and "chariots," and "full of idols;" when they hoard up provisions and preparations of their own, comply with the enemies of God abroad, and corrupt the worship of God at home: these are the things for which God threatens terribly to shake the earth, and to bring down and to make low the loftiness of man, if he do not (as Ephraim here by long and sad experience) penitently renounce and abjure them all, Isa. ii. 6—9.

And now, this is matter for which we all may be humbled. There is no sin more usual among men than carnal confidence, to lean on our own wisdom, or wealth, or power, or supplies from others, to deify counsels and armies, or horses and treasures, and to let our hearts rise or fall, sink or bear up within us, according as the creature is helpful or useless, nearer or farther from us; as if God were not a God afar off, as well as near at hand. This we may justly fear, God has, and still will visit us, because we do not "sanctify the Lord of hosts himself" in our hearts, to make him our "fear" and our defence, and that he will blow upon all such counsels and preparations as carnal confidence deifies.

Therefore we must be exhorted to take off our hopes and fears from second causes, not to glory in an arm of flesh, or to droop when that fails us; not to say in our prosperity, our mountain is so strong that we shall not be shaken; nor in our sufferings, that our wound is incurable, or our grave so deep that we shall never be raised again. But to make "the name of the Lord" our "strong tower;" for "they who know thy name will trust in thee." And for direction herein we must learn to trust in God,

1. Absolutely and for himself, because he only is absolute and of himself. Other things, as they have their being, so have they their working and power of doing good or evil only from him, Matt. iv. 4; John xix. 11. And therefore, till he take himself away, though he take all other things away from us, we have matter of encouragement and rejoicing in the Lord still, as David and Habakkuk resolve, 1 Sam. xxx. 6; Hab. iii. 17, 18. All the world cannot take away any promise from any servant of God; and there is more of reality in the least promise of God, than in the greatest performance of the creature.

2. To trust him in the way of his commandments, not in any precipices or presumptions of our own. "Trust in the Lord, and do good," Psal. xxxvii. 3. First fear him, and then trust in him; he is a "help" and "shield" only unto such, Psal. cxv. 11. It is high insolence for any man to lean upon God without his leave, and he allows none to do it but such as fear him, and obey the will of his servants, Isa. l. 10.

3. To trust him in the way of his providence, and the use of such means as he has sanctified and appointed. Though man lives not by bread alone, but by the word of blessing which proceeds out of the mouth of God; yet that word is by God annexed to bread, and not to stones; and that man would not trust God, but mock and tempt him, who would expect to have stones turned into bread. If God has provided stairs, it is not faith, but fury, not confidence, but madness, to go down by a precipice: where God prescribes means and affords secondary helps, we must obey his order, and implore his blessing in their use. This was Nehemiah's way; he prayed to God, and he petitioned the king, Neh. ii. 4. This was Esther's way; a fast to call upon God, and a feast to obtain favour with the king, Esth. iv. 16; v. 4. This was Jacob's way; a supplication to God, and a present to his brother, Gen. xxxii. 9, 13. This was David's way against Goliath; the name of the Lord his trust, and yet a sling and a stone his weapon, 1 Sam. xvii. 45, 49. This was Gideon's way against the Midianites; his sword must go along with the sword of the Lord, not as an addition of strength, but as a testimony of obedience, Judg. vii. 18. Prayer is called sometimes a lifting up of the voice, sometimes a lifting up of the hands, to teach us, that when we pray to God, we must as well have a hand to work, as a tongue to beg. In a word, we must use second causes in obedience to God's order, not in confidence of their help. The creature must be the object of our diligence, but God only the object of our trust.

Now, lastly, from the ground of the church's prayer and promise, we learn, that the way to mercy is to be in ourselves fatherless. "The poor" (saith David) "committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless," Psal. x. 14; cxlvi. 9. When Jehoshaphat knew not what to do, then was a fit time to direct his eye unto God, 2 Chron. xx. 12. When the stones of Sion are in the dust, "the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come," Psal. cii. 13. When Israel was under heavy bondage, and had not Joseph as a tender father to provide for them, then God remembered that he was their Father, and Israel his firstborn, Exod. iv. 22. Nothing will make us seek for help above ourselves, but the apprehension of weakness within ourselves. In those creatures that are weakest, nature has put an aptitude and inclination to depend on those that are stronger. The vine, the ivy, the hop, are taught by nature to clasp and cling and wind about stronger trees. The greater sense we have of our own vileness, the fitter disposition are we in to rely on God. "I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord," Zeph. iii. 12; Isa. xiv. 32. When a man is proud within, and has any thing of his own to lean upon, he will hardly trust in God, Prov. iii. 5; xxviii. 25. Israel never thought of returning to her first husband, till her way was hedged up with thorns, and no means left to enjoy her former lovers, Hos. ii. 6, 7. When the enemy has shut up and intercepted all her passages to Dan and Beth-el, to Egypt and Assyria, that she has neither friends nor idols to flee to, then she thinks of returning to her first husband, even to God.

Now from hence we learn, 1. The condition of the church in this world, which is to be as an orphan, destitute of all succour and favour, as an outcast, whom "no man seeketh after," Jer. xxx. 17. Paul entertained low thoughts of the world, and the world thought as basely of him. "The world" (saith he) "is crucified unto me, and I unto the world," Gal. vi. 14. Before conversion, the world is an Egypt to us, a place of bondage; after conversion, it is a wilderness to us, a place of emptiness and temptations.

Dii probabant
hæc, sed non pro-pter nos de celo descendit. Vobis dedit mentem ut
probaretis Lev. i. 9.
Κυριεύτην εὐχόμενος τοῦ οὐρα-νοῦ ἀρχέτω, &c.
Plat. de Superst.

Nihil rex majus mirari male paren-tibus potest, quam ut abest oratio. Se-ne. Epist. 50. Tra-me non estant nisi tecum. Bern. Soli-loq. Tu bene erit male illo aut ubi male esse poterit cum illo. Bern. ser.
1. de Adv. Det.

Nolite sperare i iniquitate, nolite
procare in spe.
Bern. ser. 2. de Advent. In vis custodit, pinguis in precipitiis. Bern.
ser. 14. in Pra. Qui habuit.

2. The backwardness of man towards grace; we go not to God till we are brought to extremities, and all other helps fail us. The poor prodigal never thought of looking after a father, till he found himself in a fatherless condition, and utterly destitute of all relief, Luke xv. 17, 18.

3. The right disposition and preparation for mercy, which is to be an orphan, destitute of all self-confidence, and broken off from all other comforts. "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them," Isa. xli. 17. God will "repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone," Deut. xxxii. 36, when there is dignus vindice nodus, an extremity fit for Divine power to interpose. Christ is set forth as a physician, which supposeth sickness; as a fountain, which supposeth uncleanness; as meat, which supposeth emptiness; as clothing, which supposeth nakedness. He never finds us till we are lost sheep; when we have lost all, then we are fit to follow him, and not before.

4. The roots of true repentance. Nos pupilli, tu miseriors. The sense of want and emptiness in ourselves, the apprehension of favour and mercy in God. Conviction of sin in us, and of righteousness in him. John xvi. 9, 10; of crookedness in us, and of glory in him, Isa. xl. 4, 5.

Hereby room is made for the entertainment of mercy; where sin abounds, grace will more abound, and the more the soul finds itself exceeding miserable, the more will the mercy of God appear exceeding merciful, Rom. v. 20; and hereby God shows his wisdom in the seasonable dispensing of mercy then when we are in greatest extremity; as fire is hottest in the coldest weather. God delights to be seen in the mount, at the grave, to have his way in the sea, and his paths in the deep waters. Mercies are never so sweet as when they are seasonable, and never so seasonable as in the very turning and critical point, when misery weighs down, and nothing but mercy turns the scale.

5. How to fit ourselves for the mercy of God, namely, to find ourselves destitute of all inward or outward comfort, and to seek for it only in him. Beggars do not put on scarlet, but rags, to prevail with men for relief: as Ben-hadad's servants put on ropes when they would beg mercy of the king of Israel. In a shipwreck a man will not load him with money, chains, treasure, rich apparel; but commit himself to the sea naked, and esteem it mercy enough to have tabulam post naufragium, one poor plank to carry him to the shore. It is not exaltation enough to Joseph except he be taken out of a prison to honour.

6. That we should not be broken with diffidence or distrust in times of trouble, but remember it is the condition of the church to be an orphan. It is the way whereby Moses came to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter; when his own parents durst not own him, the mercy of a prince found him out to advance him; and when he was nearest to perishing, he was nearest unto honour.

In the civil law we find provision made for such as were cast out, and exposed to the wide world, some hospitals to entertain them, some liberties to comfort and relieve their misery. And a like care we find in Christ; the Jews had no sooner cast out the man that was born blind, whose parents durst not be seen in his cause for fear of the like usage, but the mercy of Christ presently found him, and bestowed comfort upon him, John ix. 35.

* Mendici cum elemosynam petunt, non pretiosas vestes ostendunt, sed seminuda membra, ut ulcera si habuerint, ad cunctis ad misericordiam videntis animis inclinetur. Bern. ser. 4. de Advent.

This is the true David,† to whom all helpless persons, that are in distress, in debt, in bitterness of soul, may resort and find entertainment, 1 Sam. xxii. 2.

7. To behave ourselves as pupils under such a Guardian; to be sensible of our infancy, minority, disability to order or direct our own ways, and so deny ourselves, and not lean on our own wisdom; to be sensible how this condition exposes us to the injuries of strangers, for because we are "chosen out of the world, therefore the world hateth" us; and so to be vigilant over our ways, and not trust ourselves alone in the hands of temptation, nor wander from our Guardian, but always to yield to his wisdom and guidance. Lastly, to comfort ourselves in this, that while we are in our minority, we are under the mercy of a Father; a mercy of conservation by his providence, giving us all good things richly to enjoy, even all things necessary unto life and godliness; a mercy of protection, defending us by his power from all evil; a mercy of education and instruction, teaching us by his word and Spirit; a mercy of communion, many ways familiarly conversing with us, and manifesting himself unto us; a mercy of guidance and government by the laws of his family; a mercy of discipline, fitting us by fatherly chastisements for those further honours and employments to which he will advance us; and when our minority is over, and we once are come to a perfect man, we shall then be actually admitted into that inheritance immortal, invisible, and that fadeth not away, which the same mercy which at first purchased, now prepares and reserves for us.

Ver. 4. I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely: for mine anger is turned away from him.

In the former words we have considered both Israel's petition in time of trouble, and the promise and covenant in which thereupon they bind themselves. In these and the consequent words to the end of the 8th verse, we have the gracious answer of God to both, promising both in his free love to grant their petition, and by his free grace to enable them to perform the covenant which they had made.

The petition consisted of two parts: 1. That God would "take away all iniquity." 2. That he would do them good, or "receive" them "graciously." To both these God gives them a full and gracious answer: 1. That he will "take away all iniquity." "I will heal their backsliding." 2. That he would receive them graciously, do them good, and heap all manner of blessings upon them, which are expressed by the various metaphors of fruitfulness; opposite to the contrary expressions of judgment in former parts of the prophecy.

"I will heal their backsliding." This is one of the names by which God is pleased to make himself known to his people, "I am the Lord that health thee," Exod. xv. 26; and, "Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings," Jer. iii. 22.

Now God heals sin in a fourfold manner.

1. By a gracious pardon, burying, covering, not imputing them to us. So it seems to be expounded, Psal. ciii. 3; and that which is called healing in one place, is called forgiveness in another, Matt. xiii. 15; Mark iv. 12.

2. By a spiritual and effectual reformation, purging the conscience from dead works, making it strong and able to serve God in new obedience; for that which health is to the body, holiness is to the soul. Therefore "the Sun of righteousness" is said to "arise with healing in his wings," Mal. iv. 2; whereby we are to understand the gracious influence of the Holy Spirit conveying the virtue of the blood of Christ to the conscience, even as the beams of the sun do the heat and influence thereof to the earth, thereby calling out the herbs and flowers, and healing those deformities which winter had brought upon it.

† David homines in angustiis constitutos et oppressos ere alieno in suam tutelam suscipiens, typus Christi est publicanos et peccatores recipientis. Gloss. Philolog. Sacr. lib. 2. p. 421.

3. By removing and withdrawing judgments, which the sins of a people had brought, like wounds or sicknesses, upon them. So healing is opposed to smiting and wounding, Deut. xxxii. 39; Job v. 18; Hos. vi. 1, 2; Jer. xxxiii. 5, 6.

4. By comforting against the anguish and distress which sin is apt to bring upon the conscience. For as in physic there are purgatives to cleanse away corrupt humours, so there are cordials likewise to strengthen and refresh weak and dejected patients. And this is one of Christ's principal works, to bind and heal the broken in heart, to restore comforts to mourners, to set at liberty them that are bruised, and to have mercy upon those whose bones are vexed, Psal. cxlvii. 3; Isa. lvii. 18, 19; Luke iv. 18; Psal. vi. 2, 3. I am not willing to shut any of these out of the meaning of the text, and that for a twofold reason:

1. Because it is an answer to that prayer, "Take away all iniquity." The "all" that is in it, the guilt, the stain, the power, the punishment, the anguish, whatever evil it is apt to bring upon the conscience, remove it all, let it not do us any hurt.

2. Because God's works are perfect; where he forgives sin, he removes it; where he convinces of righteousness, to the pardon of sin, he convinces also of judgment, to the casting out of the prince of this world, and brings forth that judgment to victory, Matt. xii. 20.

"Their backsliding." Their prayer was against "all iniquity," and God in his answer thereunto singles out one kind of iniquity, but one of the greatest, by name. And that, 1. To teach them and us, when we pray against sin, not to content ourselves with generalities, but to bewail our great and special sins by name, those especially which have been most comprehensive, and proved the seminaries of many others.

2. To comfort them; for if God pardon by name the greatest sin, then surely none of the rest will stand in the way of his mercy; if he pardon the talents, we need not doubt but he will pardon the pence too. Paul was guilty of many other sins, but when he will magnify the grace of Christ, he makes mention of his great sins, a blasphemer, a persecutor, injurious; and comforts himself in the mercy which he had obtained against them, 1 Tim. i. 13.

3. To intimate the great guilt of apostasy and rebellion against God. After we have known him, and tasted of his mercy, and given up ourselves to his service, and come out of Egypt and Sodom, then to look back again, and to be false in his covenant, this God looks on, not as a single sin, but as a compound of all sins. When a man turns from God, he does as it were resume and take home again upon his conscience all the sins of his life.

4. To proportion his answer to their repentance. They confess their apostasy: they had been in covenant with God, they confess he was their "first husband," Hos. ii. 7; and they forsook him, and sought to horses, to men, to idols, to vanity and lies: this is the sin they chiefly bewail; and therefore this is the sin which God chiefly singles out to pardon and to heal them of.

This is the great goodness of God toward those that pray in sincerity, that he fits his mercy ad cardinem desiderii, answers them in the main of their desires, "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

"I will love them freely." This is set down as the fountain of that remission, sanctification, and comfort, which are here promised. It comes not from our conversion to God, but from God's free love and grace to us. And this is added,

1. To humble them, that they should not ascribe any thing to themselves, their repentance, their prayers, their covenants and promises, as if these had been the means to procure mercy for them, or as if there were any objective grounds of loveliness in them, to stir up the love of God towards them.* It is not for their sake that he does it, but for his own: The Lord sets his love upon them because he loved them, Deut. vii. 7, 8. "Not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord God, be it known unto you," Ezek. xxxvi. 32. He "will have mercy on whom" he "will have mercy," Rom. ix. 15.

2. To support them, above the guilt of their greatest sins. Men think nothing more easy while they live in sin, and are not affected with its weight and heinousness, than to believe in mercy and pardon. But when the soul, in conversion to God, feels the heavy burden of some great sins, when it considers its rebellion, and apostasy, and backsliding from God, it will then be very apt to think God will not forgive nor heal such great wickedness; there is a natural Novatianism in the timorous conscience of convinced sinners, to doubt and question pardon for sins of apostasy, and falling after repentance. Therefore in this case God takes a penitent off from the consideration of himself by his own thoughts, to the height and excellency of His thoughts who knows how to pardon abundantly, Isa. lv. 7—9; Jer. xxix. 11; Ezek. xxxvii. 3. Nothing is too hard for love, especially free love, that has no foundation or inducement from without itself.

And because we read before, Hos. viii. 5, that God's "anger" was "kindled against them," therefore he here adds that this also should be "turned away" from them. Anger will consist with love; we find God angry with Moses, and Aaron, and Miriam, and Asa; and he does sometimes "visit with the rod" and "with stripes," where he yet does "not utterly take" away his "loving-kindness" from a people, Psal. lxxxix. 52, 53. A man may be angry with his wife, or child, or friend, whom he yet dearly loves. And God is said to be thus angry with his people, when the effects of displeasure are discovered towards them. Now, on their repentance and conversion, God promises not only to "love them freely," but to clear up his countenance toward them, to make them by the removal of judgments to see and know the fruits of his free love and bounty toward them. When David called Absalom home from banishment, this was an effect of love; but when he said, "Let him not see my face," this was the continuation of anger; but at last, when he admitted him into his presence and kissed him, then that anger too was turned away from him, 2 Sam. xiv. 21, 24, 33.

These words then contain God's merciful answer to the first part of Israel's prayer, for the taking away of all iniquity, which had been the fountain of those sad judgments under which they languished and pined away. Wherein there are two parts: 1. The ground of God's answer, his free love. II. A double fruit of that love: 1. In healing their backsliding. 2. In removing his anger and heavy judgments from them. We will briefly handle them in the order of the text.

"I will heal their backsliding." When God's people return to him and pray against sin, God, out of his free love, heals them of it. He first teaches them what to ask, and then tells them what he will give. Thus we find conversion and healing joined together, Isa. vi.

* Si vera sit gratia, id est, gratuita, nihil invenit in homine cui merito debeatur. &c. Aug. lib. de Patient. c. 20. et alibi passim. Ex se sumit materiam et velut quoddam seminarium miserendi.—Miserendi causam et originem sumit ex proprio judicandi vel ulciscendi magis ex nostro. Bern. scrup. 5. in Natali Dom.

10. "And they shall return even to the Lord, and he shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them," Isa. xix. 22. "Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings," Jer. iii. 22. Men, if they be injured and provoked by those whom they have it in their power to ruin, though they return, and cry peccavi, and are ready to ask forgiveness, yet many times, out of pride and revenge, will take their time and opportunity to repay the wrong.* But God does not so; his pardons, as all his other gifts, are without exprobration; as soon as ever his servants come back to him with tears and confession, he looks not on them with scorn, but with joy; his mercy makes more haste to embrace them, than their repentance to return unto him, Luke xv. 20; then out comes the wine, the oil, the balm, the cordials; then the wounds of a Saviour do, as it were, bleed afresh to drop mercy into the sores of such a penitent. Oh, though he be not a dutiful, not "a pleasant child," yet he is a child; though "I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still: therefore my bowels are troubled for him; I will surely have mercy upon him," Jer. xxxi. 20. The Lord greatly complains of the inclination of his people to backsliding, and yet he cannot find in his heart to destroy them, but expresses a kind of conflict between justice and mercy, and at last resolves, "I am God, and not man;" I can as well heal their backsliding by my love, as revenge it by my justice; therefore "I will not execute the fierceness of mine anger," but I will cause them to "walk after the Lord," Hos. xi. 7, 9, 10. Yea, so merciful he is, that even on a hypocritical conversion, when his people did but flatter and lie unto him, and "their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant;" yet the text saith, "he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity," (not as to the justification of their persons, for that is never without faith unfeigned, but as to the mitigation of their punishment,) "and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath" against them, Psal. lxxviii. 34—38. So Ezek. xx. 17, "Nevertheless mine eye spared them from destroying them, neither did I make an end of them in the wilderness."

Now the metaphorical word both here and so often elsewhere used in this argument, leads us to look on sinners as patients, and on God as a Physician. By which two considerations we shall find set forth fully to us the exceeding mercy of God in the pardon and purging away of sin.

Healing, then, is a relative word, and leads us, first, to the consideration of a patient who is to be healed, and that is here a grievous sinner fallen into a relapse. Healing is of two sorts; the healing of a sickness by a physician; the healing of a wound by a surgeon. And sin is both a sickness and a wound. "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores," Isa. i. 5, 6. A sickness that wants healing, a wound that wants binding, Ezek. xxxiv. 4. A sick sinner, that wants a physician to call to repentance, Matt. ix. 12, 13; a wounded sinner, that wants a Samaritan (so the Jews called Christ, John viii. 48) to bind up and pour in wine and oil, Luke x. 34.

Diseases are of several sorts, but those are, of all other, most dangerous that are in the vital parts; as all the diseases of sin are, and from thence spread themselves

* Εἴπερ γὰρ τε χόλον γε καὶ αὐτῆμαρ καταπέψῃ, Ἄλλῃ γὰρ καὶ μετόπισθεν ἰχνη κότον, ὄφρα τε λίσσῃ Ἐν σπῆσιν αἰοῖσι.—Hom. Iliad. l.
 Quare et pectus Tiberius civiler habuit, sed in animo revolvit ut s. etanis impetus offensiois langueret, memoria over the whole man. Ignorance, pride, carnal principles, corrupt judgment, diseases of the head hardness, stubbornness, atheism, rebellion, diseases of the heart; lust, a dart in the liver; corrupt communication, the effect of putrid lungs; gluttony and drunkenness, the swellings and dropsies of the belly; despair and horror, the grief of the bowels; apostacy, a reactivation or relapse into all; an ear that cannot hear God speak, Jer. vi. 10; an eye quite closed up, that cannot see him strike, Isa. xxvi. 11; Jer. xlv. 18; a palate out of taste, that can neither savour nor relish heavenly things, Rom. viii. 5; lips poisoned, Rom. iii. 13; a tongue set on fire, James iii. 6; flesh consumed; bones sticking out, sore vexed and broken to pieces, Job xxxiii. 21; Psal. vi. 2; li. 8. Some diseases are dull, others acute; some stupefying, others tormenting. Sin is all; a stupefying palsy, that takes away feeling, Eph. iv. 19; a plague in the heart, which sets all on fire, 1 Kings viii. 38; Hos. vii. 4.

Let us consider a little the proper passions and effects of most diseases, and see how they meet in sin.

1. Pain and distemper. This, first or last, is, in all sin, for it begets in wicked and impenitent men the pain of guilt, horror, trembling of heart, anguish of conscience, fear of wrath, expectation of judgment and fiery indignation, as in Cain, Pharaoh, Ahab, Felix, and divers others, Gen. ix. 13, 14; Exod. ix. 27, 28; 1 Kings xxi. 27; Acts xxiv. 25; Isa. xxxiii. 14; Heb. ii. 15; Rom. viii. 15; Heb. x. 27. And in penitent men it begets the pain of shame, and sorrow, and inquietude of spirit, a wound in the spirit, a prick in the very heart, Rom. vi. 21; Ezek. xvi. 61; 2 Cor. vii. 10; Prov. xviii. 14; Acts ii. 37. Penitency and pain are words of one derivation, and are very near of kin to one another. Never was any wound cured without pain, never any sin healed without sorrow.

2. Weakness and indisposedness to the actions of life. Sin is like an unruly spleen, or a greedy wen in the body, that sucks all nourishment, and converts all supplies to its own growth, and so exhausts the strength and vigour of the soul, making it unfit and unable to do any good. Whenever it sets about any duty, till sin be cured, it goes about it like an arm out of joint, which, when you would move it one way, falls back another. It faints, and flags, and is not able to put forth any skill, or any delight, to the performance of any good duty. Naturally men are "reprobate," or void of judgment, "unto every good work." Tit. i. 16. Godliness is a mystery, a spiritual skill and trade; learning, and use, and experience, and much exercise are required in its practice, 1 Tim. iii. 16; Phil. iv. 11; Heb. v. 13, 14. To be "sinners," and to be "without strength," in the apostle's phrase, is all one, Rom. v. 6, 8. And look how much flesh there is in any man, so much disability is there to perform any thing that is good, Rom. vii. 18. Therefore the hands of sinners are said to "hang down," and their "knees" to be "feeble," and their "feet" to be "lame," that cannot make "straight paths" till they "be healed." Heb. xii. 12, 13. If they at any time on natural dictates, or some sudden strong conviction, or pang of fear, or stirrings of conscience, attempt any good work, to pray, to repent, to believe, to obey, they are quite out of their element; they are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge; they presently grow weary of any attempts at well-doing, and cannot hold out or persevere in them.

3. Decay and consumption. Sin wastes and wears vaelebat. Tacit. Annal. l. 4. Non enim Tiberium quamvis tricinio post eodem Sejani, quo ceteros mollire solent, tempus, preces, satias mitigabant, aut incerta et abolita pro gravissimis et recentibus puniret. Id. Annal. lib. 6. Vid. et. Aristot. Ethic. lib. 4. cap. 11.

Καθίπεν τὰ παρὰ δύναμιν τοῦ σωματός, ἔσ. Ἀριστ. Eth. l. i. c. ult.

*Turbæ mentis
perturbationes. Cic.
Tuscul. Quæst.*

out the vigour of soul and body, feeds on all our time and strength, and exhausts it in the services of lust. Sickness is a chargeable thing, a consumption at once to the person and to the estate. The poor woman in the gospel, who had an issue of blood, "spent all her living upon physicians, neither could be healed of any," Luke viii. 43. So poor sinners empty all the powers of soul, of body, of time, of estate, every thing within their reach, on their lusts, and are as unsatisfied at last as at the first, Eccl. i. 8. Like a silkworm, which works out its bowels into a mass wherein itself is buried, so sin waries men out, and sucks away their radical strength in its service, and yet never gives them over; but as Pharaoh's taskmasters exacted the brick when they had taken away the straw, so lust consumes and weakens natural strength, in the obedience of it; and yet when nature is exhausted, the strength of lust is as great, and the commands as tyrannous, as before, Isa. lvii. 10; Jer. ii. 25. We are to distinguish between the vital force of the faculties, and the activity of lust which sets them on work; that decays and hastens to death, but sin retains its strength and vigour still, nothing kills that but the blood of Christ; and the decay of nature arises out of the strength of sin; * the more any man, in any lust whatsoever, makes himself a servant of sin, and the more busy and active he is in that service, the more will it eat into and consume him, as the hotter the fever is, the sooner is the body wasted and dried up by it.

4. Deformity. Sickness withers the beauty of the body, makes it of a glorious a ghastly and loathsome spectacle. Go to the comeliest person living after a long and pining sickness, and you will not find them the same; a wan countenance, a shrivelled flesh, a lean visage, a hollow and standing eye, a trembling hand, a stammering tongue, a bowed back, a feeble knee, a swollen belly; nothing left but the stakes of the hedge, and a few sinews to hold them together.

*Inflatus et tumens
animus in vitio est.
Soprensus animus nunquam turgescit, nunquam tumet.
Cic. Tuscul. Quæst. l.
3. O curvus in terra
animæ et collostium finæ. Pers.
Et corpora verberibus, ita sevitiis, libidine, morbis consulis
animas dilacerantur.
Tacit. Annal. l. 6.*

Behold here the picture of a sinner, swelled with pride, pined with envy, bowed with earthliness, wasted and eaten up with lust, "filthy" and loathsome as a dead carcass, Psal. xiv. 3; Ezek. xvi. 4, 5. When thou seest an unmerciful man, that has no compassion left in him, think thou beholdest Judas or king Jehoram, whose "bowels fell out by reason of his sore diseases," 2 Chron. xxi. 19. When thou seest a worldly man, whose heart is glued to earthly things, think on the poor woman who was "bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself," Luke xiii. 11. When thou seest a hypocrite, walking crooked and unevenly in the ways of God, think upon Mephibosheth or Asa, lame, halting, diseased in their feet. When thou seest a proud, ambitious man, think upon Herod eaten up with vermin. O, if the diseases of the soul could come forth and show themselves in the body, and work such deformity there, (where it would not do the thousandth part so much hurt,) as they do within; if a man could in the glass of the word see the ugliness of the one, as plainly as in a material glass the foulness of the other; how would this make him cry out, "My head, my head;" "my bowels, my bowels;" "my leanness, my leanness;" "unclean, unclean!" No man thinks any shape ugly enough to represent a devil by; yet regard his original, and he was a most glorious creature; sin turns him into a serpent or dragon. There is something of the monster in every sin, the belly or the feet set in the place of the head or heart; sensual and worldly lusts set up above reason, and corrupt reason above grace.

* Ἀπληστος ἡ τοῦ ἁλίου ὄρεσις. Arist. Eth. l. 3. c. ult. Ποιηρία τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀπληστον τι. Ἀπειροῦ ἡ πῆρ ἐπιθυμία

Now because the sickness here spoken of is a falling sickness, and that the worst kind of fall, not forward in our way or race, as every good man sometimes falls, where a man has the help of his knees and hands to break the blow, to prevent or lessen the hurt, and to make him to rise again; but as old Eli's fall, a falling backward, 1 Sam. iv. 18; where a man can put forth no part to save the whole, and so breaks and bruises himself thereby more dangerously. Therefore as it is a sickness which requires curing, so it is a wound which requires healing and binding. The ancients compare it to falling into a pit full of dirt and stones, where a man not only defiles, but miserably breaks and bruises himself. There is contritio, solutio continui, suppuration, sanies, &c.; all the evils of a dangerous and mortal wound.

Add to all this, that in this diseased and wounded condition a man has, 1. No power to heal or to help himself, but in that respect he must cry out with them in the prophet, "Why is my pain perpetual, and my wound incurable, which refuseth to be healed?" Jer. xv. 18.

2. No desire, no will, no thought to inquire or send after a physician who may heal him; but is well contented rather to continue as he is, than to be put to the pain and trouble of a cure; yea, he pleases himself in the goodness of his own condition, Rev. iii. 17; Matt. ix. 12.

3. He is in the hands of his cruel enemy, who takes no pity on him, but by flattery and tyranny, and new temptations, continually cherishes the disease, 2 Tim. ii. 26.

4. When the true Physician comes he shuts the door against him, refuses his counsel, rejects his receipts, quarrels with his medicines; they are too bitter, or too strong and purging, or too sharp and searching; he will not be healed at all except it may be in his own way, Prov. i. 24, 25; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16; Ezek. xxiv. 13; Matt. xxiii. 37; Jer. xlii. 11. Thus we have taken a view of the patient, sick, weak, pained, consumed, deformed, wounded, and sore bruised; without power or help at home, without friends abroad; no sense of danger, no desire of change; patient of his disease, impatient of his cure; but one means in the world to help him, and he unable to procure it, and, being offered to him, unwilling to entertain it: who can expect after all this, but to hear the knell ring for such, and to see the grave open to receive them?

Now let us take a view of the Physician. Surely an ordinary one would be so far from visiting such a patient, that in so desperate a condition as this he would quite forsake him; as their use is to leave their patients when they lie a dying. Here then observe the singular goodness of this Physician.

1. Though other physicians judge of the disease when it is brought to them, yet the patient first feels it and complains of it himself; but this Physician gives the patient the very feeling of his disease, and is fain to take notice of that as well as to minister the cure. "He went on forwardly in the way of his heart," saith the Lord, and pleased himself in his own ill condition; "I have seen his ways, and will heal him," Isa. lvii. 17, 18.

2. Other patients send for the physician, and use many entreaties to be visited and their case undertaken by him. Here the Physician comes unsent for, and entertains the sick person to be healed. The world is undone by falling off from God, and yet God is the first that begins the reconciliation; that which hinders it is in the world, and not in him: therefore there is a great emphasis in the apostle's expression, "God was in φύσει. Id. Polit. l. 2. Naturalia desideria finita sunt; ex falsa opinione nascuntur, ubi desinant non habent, &c. Ser. Ep. 16.

Christ, reconciling the world unto himself," not himself unto the world; he entreats us to be reconciled, 2 Cor. v. 19, 20. He is found of them that sought him not, Isa. lxx. 1; and his office is not only to "save," but to "seek that which was lost," Luke xix. 10.

3. Other physicians are well used, and entertained with respect and honour; but our patient here neglects and misuses his Physician, falls from him, betakes himself to mountebanks and physicians of no value; yet continues he his mercy, comes when he is forsaken, nay, repelled. "I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people," Isa. lxx. 2.

4. Other physicians have usually ample and honourable rewards for the attendance they give; but this Physician comes only out of love, heals freely; nay, is bountiful to his patient, not only heals him, but bestows gifts upon him, gives the visit, gives the physic, sends the ministers and servants who watch and tend the patient.

5. Other physicians prescribe a bitter potion for the sick person to take; this Physician drinks of the bitterest himself. Others prescribe the sore to be lanced; this Physician is wounded and smitten himself. Others order the patient to bleed; here the Physician bleeds himself. Yea, he is not only the Physician, but the physic, and gives himself, his own flesh, his own blood, to heal the soul of his patient; dies himself, that his patient may live. "With his stripes we are healed," Isa. liii. 5.

We should from all this learn, 1. To admire the unsearchable riches of the mercy of our God, who is pleased in our misery to prevent us with goodness, and when we neither feel our disease, nor desire a remedy, is pleased to convince us of our sins; "Thou hast fallen by thine iniquity:" to invite us to repentance; "Take with you words, and turn to the Lord:" to put words into our mouth, and to draw our petition for us: "Say unto him, Take away all iniquity," &c.: to furnish us with arguments; We are "fatherless," "in thee" such find "mercy:" to encourage us with promises; "I will heal," "I will love:" to give us his ministers to proclaim these mercies to us, and his Spirit to apply them. If he did not convince us that "iniquity" would be our "ruin," Ezek. xviii. 30, we should hold it fast, and be pleased with our disease, like a mad-man, that quarrels with his cure, and had rather continue mad than be healed, John iii. 19—21.

If, being convinced, he did not invite us to repentance, we should run away from him, as Adam did. No man loves to be in the company of an enemy, much less when that enemy is a judge. "They have turned their back unto me, and not their face," Jer. ii. 27. Adam will hide himself "from the presence of the Lord," Gen. iii. 8; and Cain will go "out from the presence of the Lord," chap. iv. 16. Guilt cannot look upon majesty; stubble darts not come near the fire; if we be in our sins "we cannot stand before" God, Ezra ix. 15.

If, being invited, he did not put words into our mouths, we should not know what to say to him. We know not wherewith to "come before the Lord," or to "bow" ourselves "before the high God," if he do not show us "what is good," Micah vi. 6, 8. Where God is the judge, who cannot be mocked or deceived, who knows all things, and, if our heart condemn us, is greater than our heart, and wherever we hide can find us out, and make our sin find us too, Gal. vi. 7; 1 John iii. 20; Numb. xxxii. 23; where, I say, this God is the judge, there guilt stops the mouth, and makes the sinner speechless, Matt. xxii. 12; Rom. iii. 19. Nay, the best of us "know not what we should pray for as we ought," except the Spirit be pleased to help "our infirmities," Rom. viii. 26. When we are taught what to say, if God do "not withdraw his anger," we shall never be able to reason with him, Job ix. 13, 14. "Withdraw thine hand far from me: and let not thy dread make me afraid. Then call thou, and I will answer: or let me speak, and answer thou me," Job xiii. 21, 22. If he do not reveal mercy, if he do not promise love or healing, if he do not make it appear that he is a God that heareth prayers, flesh will not dare to come near unto him, 2 Sam. vii. 27. We can never pray till we can cry, "Abba, Father;" we can never call unto him but in "the multitude of his mercies." As the earth is shut and bound up by frost and cold, and puts not forth her precious fruits till the warmth and heat of the summer call them out: so the heart, under the cold affections of fear and guilt, under the dark apprehensions of wrath and judgment, is so contracted that it knows not to draw near to God; but when mercy shines, when the love of God is shed abroad in it, then also is the heart itself shed abroad and enlarged to pour out itself unto God. Even when distressed sinners pray, their prayer proceeds from apprehensions of mercy; for prayer is the child of faith, and the object of faith is mercy, Rom. x. 14; James v. 15.

2. The way to prize this mercy is to grow acquainted with our own sickness, to see our face in the glass of the law; to consider how odious it renders us to God, how desperately miserable in ourselves. The deeper the sense of misery, the higher the estimation of mercy. When the apostle looked on himself as "chief" of sinners, then he accounted it "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," 1 Tim. i. 15. Till we be sick and weary we shall not look after a physician to heal and ease us, Matt. ix. 12; xi. 28; till we be pricked in our hearts we shall not be hasty to inquire after the means of salvation, Acts ii. 37. Though the proclamation of pardon be made to "whosoever will," Rev. xxii. 17, yet none are willing till they be brought to extremities: as men cast not their goods into the sea, till they see they must perish themselves if they do not. Some men must be bound before they can be cured. All that God does to us in conversion, he does most freely; but a gift is not a gift till it be received, Rom. v. 17; John i. 12; and we naturally refuse and reject Christ when he is offered, Isa. liii. 3; John i. 11, because he is not offered but upon these terms, that we deny ourselves, and take up a cross, and follow him. Therefore we must be wrought upon by some terror or other, 2 Cor. v. 11. When we find the wrath of God abiding on us, and our souls shut under it as in a prison, John iii. 36; Gal. iii. 22, and the fire of it working and boiling like poison in our consciences, then we shall value mercy, and cry for it, as the prophet does, "Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved: for thou art my praise," Jer. xvii. 14. Things necessary are never valued to their uttermost but in extremities. When there is a great famine in Samaria, an ass's head (which at another time is thrown out for carrion) will be more worth, than, in a plentiful season, the whole body of an ox. Nay, hunger shall in such a case prevail over nature, and devour even the tender love of a mother, 2 Kings vi. 25, 28. As soon as a man finds a shipwreck, a famine, a hell in his soul, till Christ save, feed, deliver it, immediately Christ will be the desire of that soul, and nothing in heaven or earth valued in comparison of him. Then that which was esteemed "the foolishness of preaching" before, shall be counted "the power of God," and "the wisdom of God;" then every one of Christ's ordinances (which are "the waters" of the temple, for the healing of the sea, that is, of many people, Ezek. xlvi. 8; and "the leaves of the tree of life," which are for "the healing of the nations," Rev. xxii. 2; and the streams of that "fountain opened" in

*Medicis civitate donavit. Julius Cesar, Sueton. in Julio,
cap. 42.
Vis morborum pre'tia medicinalium, forti-tatem habens imperidoceat's ferti.
Tacit. Annal. lib. 11.*

*Molestus est venimum jecundum vi-renti, qui excitat.
Sen. Ep. 104.*

Israel "for sin and for uncleanness," Zech. xiii. 1; and the wings of the Sun of righteousness, whereby he conveys healing to his church, Mal. iv. 2) shall be esteemed, as indeed they are, the riches, the glory, the treasure, the feast, the physic, the salvation of such a soul, Rom. xi. 12; Eph. iii. 8; 2 Cor. iii. 8, 11; iv. 6, 7; Isa. xxv. 6; Rev. xix. 9; Luke iv. 18; Heb. ii. 3; James i. 21; John xii. 50; Acts xxviii. 28. And a man will wait on them with as much diligence and attention as ever did "the impotent folk" at the pool of Bethesda, when the angel stirred the water; and endure the healing severity of them not only with patience, but with love and thankfulness; suffer reason to be captivated, will to be crossed, high imaginations to be cast down, every thought to be subdued, conscience to be searched, heart to be purged, lust to be cut off and mortified; in all things will such a sick soul be contented to be dieted, restrained, and ordered by the counsel of this heavenly Physician.

"Their backsliding." משובתם This word imports a departing, or a turning away again, from God. It is quite contrary, in the formal nature of it, to faith and repentance, and implies that which the apostle calls a repenting of repentance, 2 Cor. vii. 10. By faith we come to Christ, John vi. 37, and cleave to him, and lay hold upon him, Heb. vi. 18; Isa. lvi. 2, 6; but by this we depart, and draw back from him, and let him go, Heb. x. 38, 39. By the one we prize Christ as infinitely precious, and his ways as holy and good, Phil. iii. 8; 2 Pet. i. 4; by the other we vilify and set them at nought, stumble at them, as ways that do not profit, Matt. xxi. 42; Acts iv. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8; Job xxi. 14, 15. For a man, having approved of God's ways, and entered into covenant with him, after this to go from his word, and fling up his bargain, and start aside like a deceitful bow; of all other dispositions of the soul, this is one of the worst; to deal with our sins as Israel did with their servants, dismiss them and then take them again, Jer. xxxiv. 10, 11. It is the sad fruit of an evil and unbelieving heart, Heb. iii. 12. And God threatens such persons to "lead them forth with the workers of iniquity," Psal. cxv. 5, as cattle are led to slaughter, or malefactors to execution. And yet we here see God promises healing to such sinners: "I will heal their backsliding."

To understand this aright we are to know that there is a twofold apostacy. 1. An apostacy arising out of impotency of affection, and prevalency of lust, drawing the heart to look toward the old pleasures thereof again: it is a recidivation or relapse into a former sinful condition out of forgetfulness and falseness of heart, for want of the fear of God to balance the conscience, and to fix and unite the heart to him. This was the frequent sin of Israel, to make many promises and covenants to God, and to break them as fast, Judg. ii. 18, 19; Psal. cvi. 7—13. And this falling from our first love,* growing cold and slack in duty, breaking our engagements to God, and returning again to folly, though it be like a relapse after a disease, exceedingly dangerous, yet God is sometimes pleased to forgive and to heal it.

2. An apostacy which is proud and malicious, when, after they "have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come," men set themselves to hate, oppose, and persecute godliness, to do "despite unto the Spirit of grace," to fling off the holy strictness of Christ's yoke, to swell against the searching power of his word, to treat "under foot the Son of God," and to count "the blood of the covenant" "an unholy thing," Heb. vi. 5; x. 29. When they know the spirituality and holiness of God's ways, the innocence and piety of his servants, yet notwithstanding set themselves against them for that reason, though under other pretences, this is not a weak, but a wilful, and (if I may so speak) a strong, and a stubborn apostacy; a sin which wholly hardens the heart against repentance, and consequently is incurable. To speak against the Son of man, that is, against the doctrine, disciples, ways, servants of Christ, looking on him only as a man, the leader of a sect, as master of a new way, (which was Paul's notion of Christ and the Christian religion when he persecuted it, and for which cause he found mercy, for had he done that knowingly which he did ignorantly, it had been a sin not to be pardoned, Acts xxvi. 9; 1 Tim. i. 13), thus to sin, is a blasphemy that may be pardoned: but to speak against the Holy Ghost, that is, to oppose and persecute the doctrine, worship, ways, servants of Christ, knowing them, and acknowledging in them a spiritual holiness, and eo nomine, on that very account, to do it, so that the formal motive of malice against them is the power and lustre of that Spirit which appears in them; and its formal principle, neither ignorance, nor self-ends, but very wilfulness, and immediate malignity; woe be to that man whose natural enmity and antipathy against godliness ever swells to so great and daring a height! "It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come," Matt. xii. 32. That is, say some, neither in the time of life, nor in the point or moment of death, which translates them into the world to come. Others, not in this life by justification, nor in the world to come by consummate redemption, and public judiciary absolution in the last day, which is therefore called "the day of redemption," in which men are said to "find mercy of the Lord," Eph. iv. 30; 2 Tim. i. 18. For that which is here done in the conscience by the ministry of the word and efficacy of the Spirit, shall be then publicly and judicially pronounced by Christ's own mouth before angels and men, 2 Cor. v. 10. Others, shall not be forgiven, that is, shall be plagued and punished both in this life and in that which is to come. Give me leave to add what I have conceived to be the meaning of this place, though no way condemning the expositions of so great and learned men: I take it thus, by "this world" we may understand the church which then was of the Jews, or the present age in which our Saviour Christ then lived. It is not, I think, unusual in the Scripture, for the words age, or world, to be sometimes restrained to the church. Now, as Israel was God's "first-born," and "the first-fruits of his increase," Exod. iv. 22; Jer. xxxi. 9; ii. 3; so the church of Israel is called the "church of the first-born," Heb. xii. 23, and "the first tabernacle," and "a worldly sanctuary," Heb. ix. 1, 8, and "Jerusalem that now is," Gal. iv. 25. And then by "the world to come," we are to understand the Christian church afterwards to be planted; for so frequently in Scripture is the evangelical church called "the world to come," and "the last days," and "the ends of the world;" and the things thereunto belonging, "things to come," which retro respiciunt tepidi et carnales facti—Eorum utique per-punctio invenias, qui post hæc redeant in gradum pristinum, nec tamen si quis hujusmodi est, desperamus de eo, tantum ut resurgere velit cito. Quauto diutius permaebit, tanto evadet difficiljus. Bernard. serm. 3. in Vigil. Vid. ser. 35. in Cant. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 16. cap. 30. Isid. Pelut. l. 1. ep. 13.

* Eorum qui peccant antequam Deum noverint, antequam miserationes ejus experti sunt, antequam portaverint jugum suave, et onus leve, priusquam devotionis gratiam et consolatioes acceperint Spiritus Sancti; eorum inquam copiosa redemptio est: at eorum qui post conversionem suam peccatis implicatur ingrati acceptæ gratiæ, et post missam manum ad aratum

Behz, Calvin, Cartwright against the Theomists, Chemnitz, Deodati.

Chryost. et Theophylact. Broughton Epistol. Nicæni. cap. 21. p. 301, 302.

Vid. Beza Annotat. in 1 Joan. v. 16.

Vid. Isidor. Pelut. lib. 1. ep. 53.

Venire ad Christum, quid est aliud quam credendo converti? Aug. de Grat. et L. Arbit. cap. 5.

Transfuga arboribus suspendunt. Tacit. de Morib. Germ. Transfuga aliquando inventa fuerunt quasi hostes inferre loci, l. 3. S. 6. ad leg. Corneli. de Sicariis. D.

had been hidden from "the beginning of the world," "from ages and from generations," and were by the ministry of the apostles made known unto the church in their time, which the "prophets and righteous men" of the former ages did not "see" nor attain unto. Thus it is said, "in these last days" God "hath spoken unto us by his Son," Heb. i. 2; and, "unto angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come," Heb. ii. 5; and, Christ was made "an High Priest of good things to come," Heb. ix. 11; and, "the law having a shadow of good things to come," Heb. x. 1: and the times of the gospel are called "the ages to come," Eph. ii. 7, and "the ends of the world," 1 Cor. x. 11. Thus legal and evangelical dispensations are usually distinguished, the former as "time past," the latter as "last days" or "ages to come," Heb. i. 1, 2; Eph. ii. 7; Col. i. 25, 26; the one an earthly and temporary, the other a heavenly and abiding administration: and so the Septuagint render the original word אבד-על Isa. ix. 6, "everlasting Father," which is one of the names of Christ, by Πατήρ τοῦ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, the Father of the world to come.

The meaning then of the place seems to be this: that sins of high and desperate presumption, committed maliciously against known light, and against the evidence of God's Spirit, as they had no sacrifice or expiation allowed for them in the former world, or state of the Jewish church, but they who in that manner despised Moses and his law, though delivered but by angels, died without mercy, Numb. xv. 27, 30, 31; Heb. ii. 2; so in the world to come, or in the evangelical church, though grace should therein be more abundantly discovered and administered unto men, yet the same law should continue still, as we find it did, Heb. ii. 2—5; vi. 4—6; x. 26—28; neither the open enemies of Christ in the one, nor the false professors of Christ in the other, committing this sin, should be capable of pardon.

This doctrine of apostacy, or backsliding, is worthy of a more large explication; but having handled it formerly on Heb. iii. 12, I shall but briefly

Obs. 1. We should beware of backsliding above all other sins, of falling in soul, as old Eli did in body, backward, and so hazarding our salvation. If once we have shaken hands with sin, never take acquaintance with it any more, but say as Israel here, "What have I to do any more with idols?" The church should be like "Mount Zion, that cannot be moved." It is a sad and sick temper of a church to toss from one side to another, and then especially when she should be healed, to be carried about with every wind.

Obs. 2. We should not be so terrified by any sin, which our soul mourns and labours under, and our heart turns from, as thereby to be withheld from going to the Physician for pardon and healing. Had he not great power and mercy, did he not "love freely," without respect of persons, and pardon freely, without respect of sins, we might then be afraid of going to him: but when he extendeth forgiveness to all kinds, "iniquity," "transgression," "sin," Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7, and has actually pardoned the greatest sinners, Manasses, Mary Magdalene, Paul, publicans, harlots, backsliders, though we should not presume hereupon to turn God's mercy into poison, and his grace into wantonness, (for mercy itself will not save those sinners that hold fast and will not forsake sin,) yet should we take heed of despairing, or entertaining low thoughts of the love and mercy of God; for such examples as these are set forth for the encouragement of all that shall "hereafter believe on" Christ "to life everlasting," 1 Tim. i. 16. And the thoughts and ways which God has to pardon sin are above our thoughts and ways, whereby we look on them in their guilt and greatness, many times, as unpardonable; and therefore are fit matter for our faith to believe and rely on, even against sense, Isa. lv. 6—9.

Now follows the fountain of this mercy.

"I will love them freely." God's love is a most free and bountiful love, having no motive or foundation but within itself, and his free love and grace is the ground of all his other mercies to his people; he shows mercy on whom and because he will. From the beginning to the end of our salvation, nothing is primarily active but free grace. Freely loved, Deut. vii. 7, 8. Freely chosen, Eph. i. 4—8. Christ the gift of free love, John iii. 16. His obedience freely accepted for us, and bestowed upon us, Rom. v. 15, 18. Justification free, Rom. iii. 24. Adoption free, Eph. i. 5. Faith and repentance free, Phil. i. 29; 2 Tim. ii. 25. Good works free, Eph. ii. 10. Salvation free, Tit. iii. 5; Acts xv. 11. Thus the foundation of all mercies is free love. We do not first give to God, that he may render to us again. We turn, we pray, we covenant, we repent, we are holy, we are healed, only because he loves us: and he loves us, not because he sees any thing lovely or amiable in us, but because he will show the absoluteness of his own will, and the unsearchableness of his own counsel towards us. We are not originally denominated good by any thing which flows from us, or is done by us; but by that which is bestowed on us. Our goodness is not the motive of his love, but his love the fountain of our goodness. None indeed are healed and saved, but those that repent and return; but repentance is only a condition, and that freely given by God, disposing the subject for salvation; not a cause, moving or procuring God to save us. It is necessary as the means to the end, not as the cause to the effect. That which looks least freed of any other act of God, his rewarding of obedience, is all, and only, mercy. When we "sow in righteousness," we must "reap in mercy," Hos. x. 12. When he renders "to every man according to his work," it is because unto him "belongeth mercy," Psal. lxxii. 12.

This is the solid foundation of all Christian comforts, that God loves freely. Were his love to us to be measured by our fruitfulness or conduct towards him, each hour and moment might stagger our hope; but he is therefore pleased to have it all of grace, "to the end the promise might be sure to all the seed," Rom. iv. 16. This comforts us against the guilt of the greatest sins, for love and free grace can pardon what it will. This comforts us against the accusations of Satan drawn from our own unworthiness. True, I am unworthy, and Satan cannot show me to myself more vile than, without his accusations, I will acknowledge myself to be; but that love which gave Christ freely, gives in him more worthiness than there is or can be unworthiness in me. This comforts us in the assured hope of glory, because when he loves he loves to the end, and nothing can separate from his love. This comforts us in all afflictions, that the free love of God, who has predestinated us thereto, will wisely order all things for the good of his servants, Rom. viii. 29—39; Heb. xii. 6.

Our duty therefore is, 1. To labour for the assurance of this free love. It will assist us in all duties; it will arm us against all temptations; it will answer all objections that can be made against the soul's peace; it will sustain us in all conditions, into which the saddest of times may bring us. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Though thousands be against us to hate us, yet none shall be against us to hurt us.

2. If God love us freely, we should love him thankfully, 1 John iv. 19, and let love be the salt to season all our sacrifices. For as no benefit is saving to us which does not proceed from love in him, so no duty is pleasing to him which does not proceed from love in us, 1 John v. 3.

Cum quis propter utilitatem aliam causam donat, quam ut libertatem et magnificentiam exerceat, hæc proprie donatio appellatur. Julian. R. de Donat. lib. 1.

3. Plead this free love and grace in prayer. When we beg pardon, nothing is too great for love to forgive: when we beg grace and holiness, nothing is too good for love to grant. There is not any one thing which faith can manage to more spiritual advantages, than the free grace and love of God in Christ.

4. We must yet so magnify the love of God, as that we turn not free grace into wantonness. There is a corrupt generation of men, who, under pretence of exalting grace, do put disgrace upon the law of God, by taking away the mandatory power thereof from those that are under grace, a doctrine most extremely contrary to the nature of this love. For God's love to us works love in us to him; and our love to him is this, that we keep his commandments; and to keep a commandment is to confirm and to subject my conscience with willingness and delight to the rule and preceptive power of that commandment. Take away the obligation of the law upon conscience as a rule of life, and you take away from our love to God the very matter about which the obedience thereof should be conversant. It is no diminution to love that a man is bound to obedience, (nay, it cannot be called obedience if I be not bound to it,) but herein the excellency of our love to God is commended, that whereas other men are so bound by the law that they fret at it, and swell against it, and would be glad to be exempted from it, they * who love God, and know his love to them, delight to be thus bound, and find infinitely more sweetness in the strict rule of God's holy law, than any wicked man can do in that presumptuous liberty wherein he allows himself to shake off and break its cords.

"For mine anger is turned away from him." When we return with sound repentance to God, then God is pleased to give more than ordinary tastes of the sweetness of his love, by removing judgments, which are the fruits of his anger, from us. This point falls in with what was handled before, on ver. 2. Therefore I shall briefly conclude with these two notes:

Obs. 3. God will have us look on all judgments as fruits of his anger, and take more notice in them of his displeasure than of our own sufferings. When wrath is gone out, the sword drawn, thousands and ten thousands slain in our coasts; Israel given to the spoil, and Jacob unto robbers; a land set on fire with civil flames, and none able to quench them; a kingdom divided within itself; a church which sometime was the asylum for other exiled and afflicted Christians to flee for shelter to, miserably torn by the foolish and unnatural divisions of brethren, and dangerously threatened by the policy and power of the common enemy, who studies how to improve these divisions to the ruin of those that foment them; our work is to make this conclusion: Our God is angry; a God that loves freely, that is infinite in mercy and pity, who does not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men: this should be our greatest affliction, and the removal of this anger, by a universal reformation and conversion to him, our greatest business. And I do verily believe that England must never think of outliving or breaking through this anger of God, this critical judgment that is upon it, so as to return to that cold and formal complexion, that Laodicean temper, that she was in before, till she have so publicly and generally repented of all those civil disorders which removed the bounds, and brought disipation upon public justice; and of all those ecclesiastical disorders which let in corruptions in doctrine, superstitions in worship, abuses in government, discountenancing of the power of godliness in the most zealous professors of it; so that our reformation may be as conspicuous as our disorders have been, and it may appear to all the world that God has washed away the filth and purged the blood of England from the midst thereof, by the spirit of judgment, and by the spirit of burning.

Obs. 4. God's love is the true ground for the removal of judgments in mercy from a people. Let all human counsels be never so deep, and armies never so active, and cares never so vigilant, and instruments never so unanimous, if God's love come not in, nothing of all these can in any wise benefit a nation. Those that are most interested in God's love, shall certainly be most secured against his judgments. Hither our eyes, our prayers, our thoughts must be directed. Lord, love us, delight in us, choose us for thyself; and then, though counsels, and treasures, and armies, and men, and horses, and all second causes fail us; though Satan rage, and hell threaten, and the foundations of the earth be shaken; though neither "the vines," nor "the olive," nor "the fig-tree," nor "the fields," nor "the herd in the stalls" yield any supplies; yet we "will rejoice in the Lord," we "will glory in the God of" our "salvation," Hab. iii. 17—19; sin shall be healed, anger shall be removed, nothing "shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord," Rom. viii. 39.

Ver. 5—7. I will be as the dew unto Israel: he shall grow as the lily, and cast forth his roots as Lebanon. His branches shall spread, and his beauty shall be as the olive tree, and his smell as Lebanon. They that dwell under his shadow shall return; they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine: the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.

In these verses is contained God's answer to the second part of Israel's petition, wherein they desired him to do them good, or to "receive" them "graciously:" and here God promises them several singular blessings, set forth by various metaphors and similitudes, all answering to the name of Ephraim, and the ancient promises made to him, Deut. xxxiii. 13—17. These blessings are opposed to many visitations threatened in the former parts of the prophecy, under metaphors of contrary import. The dew of grace, is opposed to "the morning cloud, and the early dew that passeth away," chap. xiii. 3; lilies, olives, vines, spices, to the judgments of nettles, thorns, thistles, chap. x. 8; spreading roots, to dry roots, chap. ix. 16; a fruitful vine, bringing forth excellent wine, is here opposed to an empty vine, bringing fruit only to itself, that is, so sour and unsavoury, as is not worth the gathering, chap. x. 1; corn growing, instead of corn taken quite away, chap. ii. 9, instead of no stalk, and the bud yielding no meal, chap. viii. 7; fruit promised, instead of no fruit threatened, chap. ix. 16; wine promised, in opposition to the failing of wine, chap. ix. 2; sweet wine, opposed to sour drink, chap. iv. 18; safe dwelling, instead of no dwelling, chap. ix. 3; branches growing and spreading, instead of branches consumed, chap. xi. 6; green trees, instead of dry springs, chap. xiii. 15; and all these fruits the fruits as of Lebanon, which was the most fertile part of that country, a mountain full of various kinds of the most excellent trees, cedars, et, Non est terribile sed suave mandatum. De Grat. Christi, lib. 1. cap. 13. Suave fit quod non delectabat. De Peccat. Merit. et Remis. lib. 2. cap. 17. Contr. 2. epist. Pelag. lib. 1. cap. 9. lib. 3. cap. 4. De Doctr. Christi, lib. 1. cap. 15. de Spiritu et Lit. cap. 3.

* Sub lege est qui timore supplicii quod lex minatur, non amore justitie se sentit abstinere ab opere peccati; nondum liber esse alienus a voluntate peccandi. In ipsa enim voluntate reus est, qua mallet si fieri posset non esse quod timeat, ut libere faciat quod occulte desiderat. August. de Nat. et Grat. cap. 57. Et infra, Omnia fiunt facilia charitati, cap. 69.

cypresses, olives, and divers others, affording rich gums and balsams; abounding also in the most medicinal and aromatic herbs, sending forth a most fragrant odour, whereby all harmful and venomous creatures were driven from harbouring there; and in the valleys of that mountain were rich grounds for pasture, corn, and vineyards, as the learned in their descriptions of the Holy Land have observed.

The source of all these blessings is the heavenly dew of God's grace and favour, (alluding to the abundance of dew which fell on that mountain,) descending on the church, as on a garden, bringing forth lilies; as on a forest, strengthening the cedars; as on a vineyard, spreading abroad the branches; as on an oliveyard, making the trees thereof green and fruitful; and as on a rich field, reviving the corn. Here is spiritual beauty, the beauty of the lily, exceeding that of Solomon in all his glory; spiritual stability, the roots of the cedars, and other goodly trees in that mountain; spiritual odours, and spices of Lebanon; spiritual fruitfulness, and that of all sorts and kinds for the comfort of life: the fruit of the field, "bread which strengtheneth;" the fruit of the olive trees, "oil to make his face to shine;" the fruit of the vineyard, "wine that maketh glad the heart of man," Psal. civ. 15.

We esteem him a very rich man, and most excellently accommodated, who has gardens for pleasure, and fields for corn and pasture, and woods for fuel, for structure, for defence, for beauty, and delight; and vineyards for wine and oil; and all other conveniences both for the necessities and delights of a plentiful life. Thus is the church here set forth to us as such a wealthy man, furnished with the unsearchable riches of Christ, with every kind of blessing both for sanctity and safety; as the apostle praises "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ;" namely, election to eternal life, adoption to the condition of sons, and to a glorious inheritance, redemption from misery to blessedness, remission of sins, knowledge of his will, holiness and unblamableness of life, and the seal of the Holy Spirit of promise, Eph. i. 3—13.

The scope of the words, thus showing that God singles out so many excellent good things by name in answer to that general petition, "receive us graciously;" or do us good, suggests the following general observation.

Obs. 1. God often answers prayer abundantly beyond the petitions of his people. They prayed only for good in general, leaving it (as it becomes us, who know not always what is good for us) to his holy will and wisdom in what manner and measure to do them that good; and he answers them in particular with all kinds of good things. So in the former petition they prayed in general for the forgiveness of sin, and God in particular promises the healing of their rebellions, which was the greatest of their sins. God often answers the prayer of his people, as he did the seed of Isaac with a hundredfold increase, Gen. xxvi. 12. A God's word never returns empty unto him, so the prayers of his servants never return empty to them; and usually the crop of prayer is greater than the seed out of which it grew, as the putting in of a little water into a pump makes way to the drawing out of a great deal more. Isaac and Rebekah had lived twenty years together without any children, and he grew now in years, for he was forty years old before he married; hereupon he solemnly prays to God in behalf of his wife, because she was barren, and God gave him more than it is probable he expected, for he gave him two sons at a birth, Gen. xxv. 21, 22. As the cloud, which rises out of the earth often in thin and insensible vapours, falls down in great and abundant showers; so our prayers, which ascend weak and narrow, return with a full and enlarged answer. God deals in this point with his children, as Joseph did with his brethren in Egypt; he not only put corn into their sacks, but returned the money which they brought to purchase it, Gen. xlii. 25. So he dealt with Solomon, he not only gave him wisdom and gifts of government, which he asked, but further gave him "both riches and honour," which he asked not, 1 Kings iii. 13. The people of Israel, when they were distressed by the Ammonites, besought the Lord for help; he turns back their prayers, and sends them to their idols to help them: they humble themselves, and put away their idols, and pray again, and the highest pitch to which their petitions mounted was, "We have sinned: do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee; deliver us only, we pray thee, this day," Judg. x. 15; and God answered this prayer beyond its contents; he not only delivered them from the enemy, and so saved them, but subdued the enemy under them, and delivered him into their hands; he not only gave them the relief they desired, but a glorious victory beyond their desires, Judg. xi. 22. God deals with his servants as the prophet did with the woman of Shunem; when he bid her ask what she needed, and tell him what she would have him do for the kindness she had done to him, and she found not any thing to request at his hands, he sends for her again, and makes her a free promise of that which she most wanted and desired, telling her that God would give her a son, 2 Kings iv. 16. So many times God is pleased to give his servants such things as they forget to ask, or gives them the things which they ask in a fuller measure than their own desires durst propose them. David, in his troubles, asked "life" of God, and would have esteemed it a great mercy to have been merely delivered from the fear of his enemies; and God not only answers him according to the desire of his heart in that particular, and above it too, for he gave him "length of days for ever and ever;" but, further, settled the crown upon his head, and added "honour and majesty" to his life, Psal. xxi. 2—5.

And the reasons hereof are principally two.

1. We beg of God according to the sense and knowledge which we have of our own wants, and according to the measure of that love which we bear to ourselves. The greater our love is to ourselves, the more active and importunate will our petitions be for such good things as we need. But God answers prayers according to his knowledge of us, and according to the love which he bears to us. Now God knows what things we want much better than we do ourselves, and he loves our souls much better than we love them ourselves, and therefore he gives us more and better things than our own prayers know how to ask of him. A little child will beg none but trifles and mean things of his father, because he has not understanding to look higher, or to value things that are more excellent; but his father, knowing better what is good for him, bestows on him education, trains him to learning and virtue, that he may be fit to manage and enjoy that inheritance which he provides for him: so "we know not what we should pray for as we ought," Rom. viii. 26; and when we do know our spirits are much straitened, we have but a finite and narrow love to ourselves: but God's knowledge is infinite, and his love is infinite, and according to these are the distributions of his mercy. Even the apostle himself, when he was in affliction, and buffeted by the messenger of Satan, and vexed with a thorn in his flesh, besought the Lord for nothing but "that it might depart;" but God had a far better answer in store to the apostle's prayer, and purposed to do more for him than he desired, namely, to give him a sufficiency of grace to support him, and to magnify his strength in the infirmity of his servant, 2 Cor. xii. 9. When the prophet had encouraged men to "seek" the Lord, and to "return" unto him, and that upon this assurance, that he will not only hear petitions for mercy and forgiveness, but "will abundantly pardon," or will multiply to pardon, that is, will pardon more sins than we can confess, (for with him there is not only "mercy," but "plenteous redemption," Psal. cxxx. 7,) he further strengthens our faith, and encourages our obedience to this duty, by the consideration of the "thoughts" of God, to wit, his thoughts of love, mercy, and peace towards us: "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts," Isa. lv. 6-9. He can pardon beyond our petitions, because his thoughts of mercy towards us are beyond our apprehensions, Jer. xxix. 10-14.

2. God answers prayers not always with respect to the narrow compass of our weak desires, but with respect to his own honour, and to the declaration of his own greatness; for he promises to hear us that we may "glorify" him, Psal. l. 15. Therefore he is pleased to exceed our petitions, and to do for us abundantly above what we ask or think, that our hearts may be more abundantly enlarged, and our mouths wide opened in rendering honour unto him. When Perillus, a favourite of Alexander, begged of him a portion for his daughters, the king appointed that fifty talents should be given to him, and he answered that ten would be sufficient; the king replied that ten were enough for Perillus to ask, but not enough for Alexander to grant.* So God is pleased many times to give more than we ask, that we may look upon it not only as an act of mercy, but as an act of honour; and to teach us in all our prayers to move God as well by his glory as by his mercy. So Moses, when he prays for pardon to Israel, lest God's name should be blasphemed, Numb. xiv. 15-19. So Joshua, when Israel turned their backs before their enemies: "What wilt thou do unto thy great name?" Josh. vii. 9. So Solomon, in his prayer at the dedication of the temple: "Hear thou in heaven thy dwelling-place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for; that all people of the earth may know thy name," 1 Kings viii. 43. So David, in his petitions for Israel, and for the performance of God's promise to the seed of David: "Do" all "as thou hast said. Let it even be established, that thy name may be magnified for ever," 1 Chron. xvii. 23, 24. So Asa: "O Lord, thou art our God; let not man prevail against thee," 2 Chron. xiv. 11. So Jehoshaphat: "O Lord God of our fathers, art not thou God in heaven? and rulest not thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen? and in thine hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand thee?" 2 Chron. xx. 6. So Hezekiah, when he spread the blasphemies of Sennacherib before the Lord: "Now therefore, O Lord our God, save us from his hand, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the Lord, even thou only," Isa. xxxvii. 20. So the church of God in the time of distress: "Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name: and deliver us, and purge away our sins, for thy name's sake. Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God?" Psal. lxxix. 9, 10. As every creature of God was made for his glory, Prov. xvi. 4; Rom. xi. 36; so every attribute of God works and puts forth itself for his glory. If he show mercy, it is to show "the riches of his glory," Rom. ix. 23; Eph. i. 11, 12. If he execute justice, it is to "make "his power known," Rom. ix. 17, 22; 2 Thess. i. 9. When he puts forth his power, and does terrible things, it is to make his "name known," Isa. lxv. 1-3. If he engage his truth, and make his promises yea and amen, it is for his own glory, and that his name may be magnified in doing what he has said, 2 Cor. i. 20; 2 Sam. vii. 25, 26. Whenever therefore we pray to God, and therein implore his mercy on us, his justice on his enemies, his truth to be fulfilled, his power, wisdom, or any other attribute to be manifested toward his people, the highest and most prevailing medium we can use, is the glory of his own name. God's ultimate end in working must needs be our strongest argument in praying, because therein it appears that we seek his interest in our petitions as well as and above our own.

This serves, 1. To encourage us unto prayer, because God not only hears and answers prayers, which is a sufficient motive to his servants to call upon him, "O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come," Psal. lxxv. 2; lxxvi. 20; lxxxvi. 5-7; cii. 17; but because he oftentimes exceeds the modesty, the ignorance, the fearfulness of our requests, by giving to us more than we ask. When poor men make requests to us, we usually answer them as the echo does the voice, the answer cuts off half the petition. Like the hypocrite noticed by the apostle, James ii. 15, 16, when he saw a brother or sister naked, or destitute of daily food, would bid him "Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled," but in the mean time would give him nothing that was needful; and so rather mocked than answered their requests. We shall seldom find among men Jael's courtesy, Judg. v. 25, giving milk to those that ask water, except it be as hers was, ἕωρον ἄωρον, munus cum hamo, an entangling benefit, the better to introduce a mischief: there are not many Naamans among us, that, when you beg of them one talent, will force you to take two, 2 Kings v. 23; but God's answer to our prayers is like a multiplying glass, which renders the request much greater in the answer than it was in the prayer. As when we cast a stone into the water, though but small in itself, yet the circles which it causes spread wider and wider till they fill the whole pond: so our petitions, though very weak as they come from us, and craving but some one or other good thing, yet gaining access to the fountain of life, and unsearchable treasure of mercy which is in Christ, are usually answered with many and more spreading benefits. The trumpet exceedingly strengthens the voice which passes through it; it is but as a silent breath as it comes from the mouth entering in at a narrow passage, but it issues forth with spreading and multiplied vigour: so our prayers usually go up confined to God, but they come down again with enlarged answers from him; as the root is but of one colour, when the flower which grows out of it is beautified with variety.

Now this should be a great encouragement to us to call upon God with sincerity of heart, because he multiplies to pardon, because we "know not the numbers" of his salvation, Psal. lxxi. 15, we cannot count the sum of his thoughts towards us, Psal. cxxxix. 17, 18. If any man were so wealthy, that it were all one with him to give pounds or pence, and who usually, when asked for silver, would give gold, every indigent and necessitous person would wait on this man's mercy. Now, it is as easy with God to give talents as farthings, as easy to over-answer prayers as to answer them at all. It is as easy to the sun to fill a vast palace as a little closet with light; as easy to the sea to fill a channel as a bucket with water. He can satisfy with

Seneca.

Spiritus noster clarior sonum reddit, cum illum tuba, per loni canalibus angustias tractam, patentiore novissime exitu effundit.
Seneca Epist. 105.

* Περύλλου τίνος φέλιων αἰτήσαντος προίκα τοῖς θυγατέροις, ἐκέλευσε πενήκοντα τάλαντα λαβεῖν, αὐτῷ

ἃ φήσαντος ἰκανά εἶναι ἔκα· σοὶ γὰρ ἔφη λαβεῖν, ἐμοὶ δ' οὐχ ἰκανά δοῦναι. Plutarch. Arophtheg.

goodness, and answer with wonderful and terrible things, Psal. lxxv. 4, 5. Oh who would not make requests to such a God, whose usual answer to prayer is, "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt," Matt. xv. 28; nay, who answers us beyond our own wills and thoughts, Eph. iii. 20, and measures forth mercy by the greatness of his own grace, and not by the narrowness of our desires? The shekel belonging to the sanctuary was, as many learned men think, in weight double to the common shekel which was used in civil matters; to note to us, that as God expects from us double the care in things belonging to him above what we use in the things of the world, so he usually measures back double to us again; "good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over," "into" our "bosoms," Luke vi. 38. When the man sick of the palsy was carried to Christ to be healed, Christ did beyond the expectation of those that brought him, for he not only cured him of his disease, but of his sin, gave him not only health of body, but peace of conscience; first, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee," and then, "Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house," Matt. ix. 2, 6. The thief on the cross besought Christ to remember him when he came into his kingdom, but Christ answers him far beyond his petition, assuring him that the very same day he should be with him in paradise, Luke xxiii. 42, 43. The poor man at the gate of the temple begged for nothing of Peter and John but a small alms, but they gave him an answer to his request far more worth than any other alms could be, namely, such an alms as caused him to stand in need of alms no longer, restoring him in the name of Christ to sound strength, that he walked, and leaped, and praised God, Acts iii. 6—8. In like manner God answers the prayers of his people, not always it may be in the kind, and to the express will of him that asks, but for the better, and consequently more to his real will than he himself expressed.

Si non secundum voluntatem, tamen ad utilitatem. Πρὸς ἃ βύλητε, αἱ δὲ λέγετε παρρησιασθῆναι, Ἀποστόλους ἀπὸ Πιτάρου Λατικῆ. Apollithg.

2. To encourage us in prayer to beg for an answer, not according to the defect and narrowness of our own low conceptions, but according to the fulness of God's own abundant mercies. It would not please one of us if a beggar should ask of us gold or jewels, silk or dainties; we would esteem such a petitioner more full of pride and impudence than of want. But God delights to have his people beg great things of him, to implore the performance of "exceeding great and precious promises," 2 Pet. i. 4; to pray for a share in "the unsearchable riches of Christ," to know things which pass knowledge, and to "be filled with all the fulness of God," Eph. iii. 8, 18, 19; to ask things which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man," 1 Cor. ii. 9; to ask not as beggars only for an alms, but as children for an inheritance, Rom. viii. 15, 17, 23; Gal. iv. 6, 7; not to ask some thing, or a few things, but "in every thing" to let our "requests be made known unto God," Phil. iv. 6, because with Christ he doth "freely give us all things," Rom. viii. 32, even "richly all things to enjoy," 1 Tim. vi. 17.

As Alexander the Great was well pleased with Anaxarchus the philosopher when he desired a hundred talents of his treasurer: He does well, saith he, in asking it, and understands his friend aright, who has one both able and willing to give him so great a gift. God allows his children a spiritual and heavenly ambition, to covet earnestly the best gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 31; to aspire to a kingdom, and accordingly to put up to him great and honourable requests; to think what great things Christ has purchased, what great things God has promised and proposed to us, and to regulate our prayers more by the merits and riches of Christ, and by the greatness of God's mercies, than by those apprehensions which we cannot but have of our own unworthiness.

Thus far from the general scope of the text, and though many particular observations might be raised from the special blessings enumerated, yet I shall briefly comprehend them all in the following:

Obs. 2. On those whom God loves and pardons, he pours forth the benediction of his grace and Spirit, as the dew of heaven, to quicken them to a holy and fruitful conversation. The promises set down in general terms before, "I will heal," "I will love," are here further amplified by many excellent metaphors, and elegant figures, nine in number, multiplied into so many particulars, partly because of the difficulty attendant on the belief of the promise; partly because of the dejected state of the people under the variety of their former sufferings, who are therefore by variety of mercies to be raised up and revived; and partly to represent the perfection and completeness of the blessings intended, which should be of all sorts, and suited to all purposes. The foundation of all the rest is this, that God promises to "be as the dew unto Israel;" for Ephraim having been cursed with much drought and barrenness, when God blesses him again, he promises to be to him as dew is to the weary and thirsty ground, which so refreshes it that the fruits thereof grow and flourish again. Lilies, flowers, trees, vines, corn, are very apt (especially in such hot countries as Judea) without much refreshing dew and showers from heaven, to dry up and wither away; so would Ephraim have been quite consumed by the heavy wrath of God, unless revived by the heavenly refreshments of his grace and Holy Spirit.

But we shall proceed now to consider the words themselves.

"I will be as the dew unto Israel." אֲנִי יְהוָה כַּטֵּל לְיִשְׂרָאֵל. Dew, in its natural signification, imports a comforting, refreshing, and encouraging, a calling forth the fruits of the earth, by gently and insensibly insinuating itself into the ground; and in that sense is mentioned as a blessing, Gen. xxvii. 39: in its mystical and spiritual sense, it signifies Christ, Psal. lxxii. 6; who by his holy word and heavenly grace, dropping down and distilling on the souls of men, Deut. xxxii. 2; Job xxix. 22, 23; by his princely favour and loving countenance, which "is as a cloud of the latter rain," Prov. xvi. 15; xix. 12; by his heavenly righteousness, and most spiritual efficacy, Isa. xxvi. 19; xlv. 8; so quickens, vegetates, and revives the hearts of men, that they, like dew "from the womb of the morning," are born in great abundance to him, as multitudes of men and believers are wont to be expressed in the Scripture by drops of dew, Psal. cx. 3; Micah v. 7. In one word, all that which dew is to the fields, gardens, vineyards, flowers, fruits of the earth, after a hot and scorching day, the favour, word, grace, loving countenance, and Holy Spirit of Christ, will be to the drooping and afflicted consciences of his people.

From this metaphor then we learn,

1. That we are naturally dry, barren, fruitless, and utterly unable to do any good, to bring forth any fruit unto God; like a heathy and parched land, subject to the scorching terrors of the wrath of God, and to his burning indignation. So Christ compares Jerusalem to a dry, withered tree, fitted for judgment, Luke xxiii. 31; and he assures us that out of him we can do nothing, John xv. 4, 5. In us of ourselves there dwelleth "no good thing," Rom. vii. 18; we are not of ourselves, as of ourselves, sufficient to any thing, 2 Cor. iii. 5: he is the sun that heats us, Mal. iv. 2; the rain that fertilizes us, Psal. lxxii. 6; the root from which we derive life and nourishment, Rev. xxii. 16. As natural, so much more spiritual, fruitfulness, has its ultimate resolution into him, who alone is the father of the rain, and begetheth the drops of dew, Hos. ii. 21, 22; Job xxxviii. 28.

Chrysost. in Psal. li. 7.

2. That the grace of God is like dew to the barren and parched hearts of men, to make them fruitful. There are many things wherein the resemblance stands.

1. None can give it but God; it comes from above, it is of celestial origin, the nativity thereof is from "the womb of the morning," Psal. cx. 3. "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain, or can the heavens give showers? art not thou he, O Lord our God? therefore we will wait upon thee: for thou hast made all these things," Jer. xiv. 22. And the like we may say in a more strict and peculiar sense of regeneration, that it is a spiritual and heavenly birth; it is "not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God;" there is no concurrence or active assistance of the flesh, or of any natural abilities, to a birth which is merely spiritual, John i. 13; iii. 5, 6; James i. 17, 18. Therefore Christ was pleased to go up into heaven, before he shed forth his Holy Spirit in abundance on the church, John vii. 39; xvi. 7; Acts i. 4, 5; to teach us that our conversion and sanctification come from above,* by a Divine teaching, by a spiritual conviction, by a supernatural and omnipotent traction, by a heavenly calling, by the will of him who alone can give a will to us: no voice can be heard by those that are dead, but "the voice of the Son of God," John v. 25; vi. 44, 45; xvi. 8—11; James i. 18; Phil. ii. 13; Heb. iii. 1; xii. 25; and withal to acquaint us whither the affections and conversations of men thus sanctified should tend, namely, to heaven, as every thing works towards its original, and every part inclines to the whole, Col. iii. 1, 2; Phil. iii. 20. In allusion to this metaphor of dew or rain, the Holy Spirit is said to be poured out upon the churches, Acts ii. 17; Tit. iii. 6. And the word of grace is frequently compared to rain. As it is the seed by which we are enabled to be fruitful, Matt. xiii. 19, so it is the rain which softens the heart, that it may be the better wrought on by that seminal virtue, Isa. lv. 10, 11; Heb. vi. 7; whereas false teachers are called "clouds without water," Jude 12, they have no fructifying virtue in them. None can give grace but God; it is heavenly in its nature, therefore it is so in its original; it "tarieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men," Micah v. 7: it depends not on the wills, concurrences, preparations, or dispositions which arise out of us, but it wholly prevents us; we are made active by it, but we are not at all antecedently active in fitting or disposing ourselves for it.

2. It is the fruit of a serene, clear, and quiet heaven; for dew never falls either in scorching or in tempestuous weather, as philosophers have observed. In like manner, the grace, favour, and blessings of God, are the fruits of his reconciled affection towards us: upon the wicked he rains storm and tempest, he showers down on them the fury of his wrath, and shows himself dark, cloudy, gloomy, terrible unto them, Psal. xi. 6; lxxxiii. 15; Job xx. 23; Nah. i. 3, 8; but unto those that fear his name he opens a clear and a gracious countenance, and, being reconciled to them, sheds abroad his love into their hearts, and his peace into their consciences, like Gideon's dew on the fleece and on the ground, as a special evidence of his grace: and therefore the psalmist compares the love and peace that is amongst brethren unto dew, which ever falleth from a calm, serene, and quiet sky, Psal. cxxxiii. 3.

3. It is abundant and innumerable. Who can number the drops of dew on the ground, or the hairs of little rain? (for so they are called in the original, כַּטְיִירִי, because of their smallness and number, Deut. xxxii. 2.) So Hushai expresses the multitudes of all Israel, 2 Sam. xvii. 12, "We will light upon him as the dew falleth on the ground." And the multitudes of believers are said to be born unto Christ by his sending forth the rod of his strength, as dew "from the womb of the morning," Psal. cx. 3, which we find verified, Acts ii. 41; v. 14, 16; vi. 7; ix. 31, 42; xix. 20. Such is the grace and favour of God to his people after their conversion; unsearchable, it cannot be comprehended or measured, nor brought under any number or account, Psal. lxxi. 15; cxxxix. 17, 18. Christ is compared to manna: he was the bread that came down from heaven, John vi. 50, 51; and manna came in mighty abundance, so that there was enough for every one to gather, Exod. xvi. 16. It had dew under it, and dew over it, as we may conjecture by comparing Exod. xvi. 14, with Numb. xi. 9; whereunto "the Holy Ghost seems to allude when he speaks of "the hidden manna," Rev. ii. 17; though that Lud. Capel. Spicilæg. page 132, 133. may likewise refer to the pot of manna which was kept in the tabernacle, Exod. xvi. 32, 33; Heb. ix. 4; as our life is said to be hid with Christ, now he is in heaven, Col. iii. 3. By this dew coming along with manna, is intimated, that the mercies of God in Christ, his daily mercies, (which are said, with allusion, I suppose, to this manna, to be "new every morning," Lam. iii. 23,) and his hidden mercies, to wit, the inward comforts of his grace and Spirit, are all innumerable and past finding out. We may say of his mercies, as the psalmist of his commandments, "I have seen an end of all perfection," but these thy mercies are "exceeding broad;" more than eye hath seen, or ear heard, or the heart itself is able to comprehend, Psal. cxix. 96; 1 Cor. ii. 9.

4. It is silent, slow, insensible; while it is falling you cannot say, Here it is: it deceives the eye, it is too subtle to be discerned by it: it deceives the ear, it is too silent for that to hear it: it eludes the touch, and is too thin and spiritual to be apprehended. You see it when it is come, but you cannot observe how it comes. In this manner was God pleased to fill the world with the knowledge of his gospel, and with the grace of his Spirit; by quiet, small, contemptible, and, as it were, insensible means. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," that is, with any visible, notable splendour, or external pomp, (as the Jews expected the Messiah to come,) but it came with spiritual efficacy, and with internal power on the consciences of men, and spread itself over the world by the ministry of a very few despised instruments, Luke xvii. 20, 21; with respect to which manner of working the Spirit is compared to wind, which we hear and feel, but cannot tell "whence it cometh, and whither it goeth," John iii. 8. The operations of grace on the conscience are secret, and silent; you shall find mighty changes wrought, and shall not tell how they were wrought; the same man coming into the church one hour a swine, a dog, a lion, and going out the next in all visible respects the same, but invisibly changed into a lamb.

5. It is of a soft and benign nature, which gently insinuates and works itself into the ground, and by degrees moistens and mollifies it, that it may be fitted to the seed which is cast into it. In like manner the Spirit, the grace, the word of God, is of a searching, insinuating, softening quality; it sinks into the heart, and works itself into the conscience, and from thence makes way for itself into the whole man, mind, thoughts, affections, words, actions, fitting them all unto the holy seed that is put into them: as the earth, being softened

* Ita docet ut quod quisque didicerit, non tantum cognoscendo videat sed etiam volendo appetat, agendoque perficiat. Aug. de Grat. Christ. cap. 14. 21. et cont. 2. Epist. Pelag. lib.

1. cap. 19. 20. Vocatio alta et secreta. Epist. 107. Bernard. Sermon. Parv. serm. 66.

and mingled with the dew, is the more easily drawn up into those varieties of herbs and fruits which it maintains.

6. It is of a vegetating and quickening nature, it causes things to grow and revive again; therefore the prophet calls it "the dew of herbs," Isa. xxvi. 19, which are thereby refreshed, and recover life and beauty: even so the word and Spirit of grace, distilling upon the soul, as small rain upon tender herbs, and as showers on the grass, cause it to live the life of God, and to bring forth the fruits of holiness and obedience, Isa. lv. 10, 11. Those parts of the world which are under either perpetual frosts, or perpetual scorings, are barren and fruitless, the earth being closed up, and the sap thereof dried away by such distempers. Such is the condition of a soul under wrath, that has no apprehensions of God but in frost or fire; for "who can stand before his cold?" Psal. cxlvii. 17; who can "dwell with everlasting burnings?" Isa. xxxiii. 14. Fear contracts and binds up the powers of the soul; more than any other affection it indisposes to regular action. But when the soul can apprehend God as love, find healing in his wings, and reviving in his ordinances, this love is of an opening and expansive quality, calling forth the heart to duty; love within, as it were, hastening to meet and close with love without, the love of obedience in us, with the love of favour and grace in God. I shut and bar my door against an enemy whom I fear, and look upon as armed to hurt me; but I open wide my door, my bosom, to a friend whom I love, and look upon as furnished with counsel, and comfort, and benefits to revive me. There is a kind of mutual love between dew and the earth; dew loves the earth with a love of beneficence, doing it good, and earth loves dew with a love of concupiscence, earnestly desiring and opening unto it. Such is the love between Christ and the soul, when he appears as dew to it; he visits the soul with a love of mercy, reviving it, and the soul puts forth itself towards him in a love of duty, earnestly coveting as well to serve as to enjoy him.

7. It is of a refreshing and comforting nature, tempering the heat of those hotter countries, and so causing the face of things to flourish with beauty and delight. So God promises to be to his people in their troubles "like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest," Isa. xlviii. 4. The spiritual joy and heavenly comfort which the peace and grace of God ministers to the consciences of believers, Rom. xv. 13; v. 1; Phil. iv. 4; 1 Pet. i. 8, is said to make the "bones flourish like an herb," Isa. lxxvi. 14. (As, on the other side, of "a broken spirit" it is said, that it "drieth the bones," Prov. xvii. 22.) "Their soul" (saith the prophet) "shall be as a watered garden; and they shall not sorrow any more. I will turn their mourning into joy, and will comfort them, and make them rejoice from their sorrow," Jer. xxxi. 12, 13.

From all which we should learn, 1. To be sensible of our own personal and spiritual dryness, barrenness, emptiness of fruit and peace, hard hearts, withered consciences, guilty spirits, under our own particular sins; so in regard of the whole land, to take notice of that tempest of wrath, which, like an east wind out of the wilderness, drieth up our springs, and spoiled our treasures, as the prophet complains, Hos. xiii. 15, 16; and to be humbled into penitent resolutions, as the church here is. If God, who was wont to be as dew to our nation, who made it heretofore like a paradise and a watered garden, be now to it as a tempest, as a consuming fire, turning things upside down, burning up the inhabitants of the earth, causing our land to mourn, and our joy to wither, Joel i. 12, this is an evident sign, that "the earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof," Isa. xxiv. 4, 5. Therefore as our sins have turned our dew into blood, so our repentance must turn our blood into dew again. If ever we look to have a happy peace, we must make it with God: men can give peace only to our bodies, our fields, our houses, our purses, (nor that neither without his overruling power and providence, who alone manages all the counsels and resolutions of men,) but he alone can give peace to our consciences by the assurance of his love, which is "better than life." And if there should be peace in a nation, made up only by human prudence and correspondences, without public repentance, and thorough reformation in church, in state, in families, in persons, in judgment, in manners, it would be but like those short interims between the Egyptian plagues, Exod. viii. 15; ix. 34; a respiting only, not a removing of our affliction; like the shining of the sun on Sodom, before the fire and brimstone fell upon it, Gen. xix. 23, 24. We all cry and call for peace, and, while any thing is left, would gladly pay dear, very dear, to recover it. But there is no sure and lasting purchase of it, but by feigned repentance and turning to God; this is able to give peace in the midst of war. In the midst of storm and tempest, Christ is sufficient security to the tossed ship, Matt. viii. 24, 27. "This man" is "the peace" even "when the Assyrian" is in the "land," Micah v. 5. Whereas impentence, even when we have recovered an outward peace, leaves us still in the midst of most potent enemies; God, Christ, angels, Scripture, creatures, conscience, sins, curses, all these are arrayed against us. The apostle tells us, that lusts "war against the soul," 1 Pet. ii. 11. There is a strong emphasis in the word "soul," the soul is more worth than all the world, nothing to be taken in exchange for it, Matt. xvi. 26. So long as we have our lusts unconquered, we are under a war the most woeful, which spoils us not of our blood, our money, our corn, our cattle, our houses, our children, but of the salvation of our immortal souls. Time will repair the ruins of other wars, but eternity itself will not deliver that poor soul which has fallen in the wars of lust.

Therefore, if you would have peace as a mercy, get it from God, let it be a dew from heaven on your conversion to him. A "king's favour" is said to be as "dew upon the grass," Prov. xix. 12, and as "a cloud of the latter rain," Prov. xvi. 15; and it would with all joyfulness be so apprehended, if by that means the blessing of peace were bestowed on these distressed kingdoms. How much more comfortable would it be to have it as a gift from God to a repenting nation! For God can give peace in anger, as well as war. A ship at sea may be distressed by a calm, as well as broken by a tempest. The cattle which we mean to kill, we first prefer to some fat pasture: and sometimes God gives over punishing, not in mercy, but in fury; leaving men to go on quietly in their own hearts' lusts, that they who are filthy may be filthy still, Psal. lxxxii. 12; Hos. iv. 14, 17; Isa. i. 5; Ezek. xxiv. 13. God was exceedingly angry with Israel when he gave them their hearts' desire, in sending them quails, Numb. xi. 32, 33. Many men get their desires from God's anger by murmuring, as others do theirs from his mercy by prayer; but then a curse attends them. Now therefore, when our own sword devours us, when our land is, "through the wrath of the Lord of hosts," so darkened, that "the people" thereof are "as fuel of the fire," "no man" sparing "his brother," "every man" eating "the flesh of his own arm," (the sad character which the prophet gives of a civil war, Isa. ix. 19, 20,) let us take heed of God's complaint, "In vain have I smitten your children, they received no correction," Jer. ii. 30. Let us make it our business to recover God. It is he that "maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth," Psal. xlv. 9. And it is he who poureth out upon men "the strength of battle," and giveth them "for a spoil" "to the robbers," Isa. xlii.

24, 25. A sinful nation gains nothing by any human treaties, policies, counsels, contributions, till by repentance they secure their interest in God, and get him on their side. God being prevailed with by Moses in behalf of Israel, after the horrible provocation of the golden calf, sends a message to them: "I will send an angel before thee; and I will drive out the Canaanite—unto a land flowing with milk and honey: for I will not go up in the midst of thee." And presently there follows in the next verse, "When the people heard these evil tidings they mourned," Exod. xxxiii. 2—4. What were "these evil tidings?" to have an angel to protect and lead them? to have their enemies vanquished? to have possession of a land flowing with milk and honey? was there any thing lamentable in all this? Yes; to have all this and much more, and not to have God and his presence, was heavy tidings to God's people. And therefore Moses ceased not to plead with God till he promised them his own presence again, with which Moses chose rather to stay in a wilderness, than without it to go into the land of Canaan: "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence," Exod. xxxiii. 13—15.

2. Whatever our spiritual wants are, to look up to heaven for a supply of them. Neither gardens, nor woods, nor vineyards, nor fields, nor flowers, nor trees, nor corn, nor spices, will flourish or revive without the dew and concurrence of heavenly grace. Christ alone is "all and in all" to his church: though the instruments be earthly, yet the virtue which gives success to them comes from heaven. We shall thus consider the succeeding metaphors, as connected with and dependent on him who is emphatically "the dew" unto his spiritual "Israel."

"He shall grow as the lily." יפר כשושנה The beauty of the lily, or, as the prophet David calls it, "the beauties of holiness," arise from "the dew of the morning," Psal. cx. 3. He is the ornament, the attire, the comeliness of his spouse. For his people to forget him, is for "a maid" to "forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire," Jer. ii. 32. The perfect beauty of the church, is that comeliness of his which he communicates to her, Ezck. xvi. 14. Of ourselves we are "wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked;" our "gold," our riches, our "white raiment," we must buy of him, Rev. iii. 17, 18. He is the Lord our righteousness, whom therefore we are said to put on, Rom. xiii. 14. He has "made us unto our God kings and priests," Rev. v. 10; and being such, he has provided beautiful robes for us, as once he appointed for the priests, Exod. xxviii. 2; Rev. iv. 4; vi. 11; vii. 9. This spiritual beauty of holiness in Christ's church, is sometimes compared to the marriage ornaments of a queen, Psal. xlv. 14; Rev. xix. 7, 8; xxi. 2; sometimes to the choice flowers of a garden, roses and lilies, Cant. ii. 1, 2; sometimes to a most glorious and goodly structure, Rev. xxi. 10—17; sometimes to the shining forth of the moon, and the brightness of the sun, Cant. vi. 10; Rev. xii. 1. All the united excellencies of the creatures are too low to adumbrate and figure the glories of the church.

"And cast forth his roots as Lebanon." יך שרשיו כלבנון The root and stability of the church is in and from him; he is "the Root of David," Rev. v. 5. Except he dwell in us, we can neither be rooted nor grounded, Eph. iii. 17. All our strength and sufficiency is from him, Phil. iv. 13; Eph. vi. 10; 1 Pet. v. 10.

* Paulum audi dicentem, Petra autem erat Christus. Aug. in Psal. ix. Super hanc Petram quam confessus es, super hanc Petram quam cognovisti dicens, Tu es Christus Filius Dei vivi, edificabo ecclesiam meam. De Verbis Dom. serm. 13. Quid est super hanc Petram? Super hanc fidem: super id quod dictum est, Tu es Christus Filius Dei. Tract. 10 in Epist.

The graft is supported by another root, and not by its own. This is the reason of the stability of the church, because it is founded on a rock, Matt. xvi. 18; not on Peter,* but on him whom Peter confessed; on the apostles only doctrinally, but on Christ personally, as "the chief corner-stone, elect, precious," in whom whosoever "believeth" "shall not be confounded," Eph. ii. 20, 21; 1 Pet. ii. 6. This is the difference between the righteousness of creation and the righteousness of redemption; the state of the world in Adam, and the state of the church in Christ. Adam had his righteousness in his own keeping, and therefore when the power of hell set upon him he fell from his steadfastness; there was no promise given to him that "the gates of hell" should "not prevail against" him; being of an earthly constitution he had corruptibility, mutability, infirmity belonging to him from the very principles of his being. But Christ, the Second Adam, is "the Lord from heaven," over whom death has neither claim nor power; and the righteousness and stability of the church are founded on, and have their original in, him. The powers of darkness must be able to evacuate the virtue of his sacrifice, to stop God's ears to his intercession, to repel and keep back the supplies and influences of his Spirit, to keep or recover possession against his ejection, in one word, to thrust him away from the right hand of the Majesty on high, and to kill him again, before ever they can overthrow his church. As Plato compared a man, so may we the church, to a tree inverted, with the root above and the branches below. And the root of this tree not only serves to give life to the branches while they abide in it, but to hold them fast that none can prevail to cut them off, John x. 28, 29.

"His branches shall spread." ילכו וינקוטיו The growth and spreading abroad of the branches of the church, is from him whose name is "the Branch," Isa. xi. 1; Zech. iii. 8. To him "the uttermost parts of the earth" are given for a "possession," and all "the kingdoms of this world are" to "become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ," Psal. ii. 8; Rev. xi. 15. In regard of his first dispensation towards Israel, God's first-born, the land of Canaan is peculiarly called Immanuel's land, Isa. viii. 8. But in regard of his latter dispensation, when he sent "the rod of his strength out of Zion," and went forth conquering and to conquer, and gave commission to preach the gospel to every creature, the whole world is now, under the gospel, become Immanuel's land, and he is "the King of all the earth," Psal. xlvii. 7; "King of kings, and Lord of lords," Rev. xix. 16. "The Gentiles" "come" in to the "light" of his church, and "kings to the brightness of" her "rising;" and "the nation and kingdom that will not serve" her "shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted," Isa. lx. 3, 12. Now every country is Canaan, and every Christian church the Israel of God, and every regenerate person born in Zion, and every spiritual worshipper the circumcision; now Christ is crucified in Galatia, and a passover eaten in Corinth, and manna fed on in Pergamos, and an altar set up in Egypt, and Gentiles sacrificed, and stones made children unto Abraham, and temples unto God: see John iv. 21; Mal. i. 11; Zeph. ii. 11; Gal. vi. 16; Isa. xiv. 1; xlv. 5; Zech. viii. 23; Rom. ii. 29; Psal. lxxxvii. 4, 5; Phil. iii. 3; Col. ii. 11; Gal. iii. 1; 1 Cor. v. 7, 8; Rev. ii. 17; Isa. xix. 19, 21, 23; Rom. xv. 16; Luke iii. 8; Eph. ii. 21. In Christ's former dispensation the church was only national, amongst the Jews; but in his latter dispensation it is oecumenical and universal, over all the world; a spreading tree, under the shadow of the branches whereof "shall dwell all fowl of every wing," Ezek. xvii. 23.

1. Joann. Felix fidei petra, Petri ore confesso, Tu es Christus Filius Dei. Hilar. de Trin. lib. 2. Super hanc confessionis Petram, Ecclesie edificatio est, lib. 6. 'Επι ταύτη τη πέτρα, νοτισται τη πιασει της ομολογίας. Chrysost. in loc. Vid. Isid. Pel. lib. 1. Ep. 235. Casaub. Exercit. ad Annal. Eccles. 15. c. 12 et 13. Sixt. Senen. l. 6. Annot. 68, 69

"And his beauty shall be as the olive tree." יְהִי כְבוֹד הַקֹּדֶשׁ The graces of the Holy Spirit wherewith the church is anointed are from him. He is the olive tree which empties the golden oil out of himself, Zech. iv. 12. Of his fulness we all receive grace for grace, John i. 16. With the same Spirit are we anointed, animated by the same life, regenerated to the same nature, renewed into the same image, reserved unto the same inheritance, dignified in some respect with the same offices, made priests to offer spiritual sacrifices, and kings to subdue spiritual enemies, and prophets to receive teaching from God, and to have a duplicate of his law written in our hearts, 2 Cor. i. 21; John xiv. 19; 1 Cor. xv. 48, 49; Rom. viii. 17; 1 Pet. ii. 5; Rev. i. 6; John vi. 45; Jer. xxxi. 33.

"And his smell as Lebanon." רִיחַ לֵבָנוֹן The sweet perfume and scent or smell of Lebanon, which arises out of holy duties, the grace which drops from the lips of his people, the spiritual incense which arises out of their prayers, the sweet savour of the gospel which spreads itself abroad in the ministry of his word and in the lives of his servants, they have all their origin in him, and from his heavenly dew. Of ourselves, without him, as we are altogether unclean, Psal. xiv. 3; Prov. xiii. 5, so we defile every holy thing with which we meddle, Hag. ii. 13, 14; Prov. xxviii. 9; Isa. i. 11—15; insomuch that God saith, "I hate, I despise your feast days, and I will not smell in your solemn assemblies," Amos v. 21; they are all of them, as they come from us, "gall and wormwood," "their clusters are bitter," Deut. xxix. 18; xxxii. 32. But when the Spirit of Christ blows upon us, and his grace is poured into our hearts and lips, then the spices flow out, Cant. iv. 16; then prayer goes up like incense and sweet odours, Rev. v. 8; then, instead of corrupt, rotten, contagious communication, our discourses tend to edifying, and "minister grace to the hearers," Eph. iv. 29; then the savour of the knowledge of Christ manifests itself in the mouths and lives of his servants in every place where they come, 2 Cor. ii. 14.

"They that dwell under his shadow shall return." יִשְׁבּוּ יְשִׁבֵי בְצֵלָה The shadow and refreshment, the refuge and shelter, of the church against storm and tempest, against rain and heat, against all trouble and persecution, is from him alone. He is the only defence and covering that is over the assemblies and glory of Zion, Isa. iv. 5. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower," into which "the righteous" run and are "safe," Prov. xviii. 10. So the Lord promises, when his people should be exiles from his temple and scattered out of their own land, that he would himself be "a little sanctuary" to them in the countries where they should come, Ezek. xi. 16. He is a "dwelling place" to his church in all conditions, Psal. xc. 1; xci. 1, 2; "a strength to the needy," "a refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat," "an hiding-place from the wind," "a covert from the tempest," "a chamber" wherein to retire when indignation is kindled, Isa. xxv. 4; xxvi. 20; xxxii. 2. Every history of God's power, every promise of his love, every observation and experience of his providence, every comfort in his word, the knowledge which we have of his name by faith, and the knowledge which we have of it by experience, are so many arguments to trust in him, and so many hiding-places in which to flee unto him against any trouble. "What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee," Psal. lvi. 3. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God," Psal. xlii. 5, 11. He "delivered," he "doth deliver," he "will deliver," 2 Cor. i. 10. Many times the children of God are reduced to such extremities, that they have nothing wherewith to encourage themselves but their interest in him; nothing to flee to for hope but his great name, made known to them by faith in his promises, and by experience of his goodness, power, and providence. This was David's case at Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. 6; Israel's at the Red Sea, Exod. xiv. 10, 13; Jonah's in the belly of the fish, Jonah ii. 4, 7; and Paul's in the shipwreck, Acts xxvii. 20, 25. God is never so much glorified by the faith of his servants, as when they can maintain their trust in him against sight and sense; and when reason saith, Thou art undone, for all help fails thee, can answer in faith, I am not undone, "for he hath said, I will never leave thee nor forsake thee," Heb. xiii. 5.

"They shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine." יִחַי רִנָּן וְיִצְרַח בִּנְיָן The power which the church has to rise up above her pressures, to outgrow her troubles, to revive after lopping and harrowing, to make use of* affliction as a means to flourish again, all this is from him. That in trouble we are not overwhelmed, but can say with the apostle, "As † dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things;" like the corn which dies and is quickened again; like the vine that is lopped and spreads again; all this is from him who is "the resurrection, and the life," John xi. 25; who was that grain of wheat, which dying, and being cast into the ground, brought forth much fruit, John xii. 24; the Branch which grew out of the roots of Jesse, when that goodly family was sunk so low as from David the king to Joseph the carpenter, Isa. xi. 1.

"The scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon." אֵשֶׁת בִּנְיָן As God is the author of all these blessings to his people, so when he bestows them he does it in perfection; the fruits which this dew produces are as the fruits of Lebanon, most choice and excellent. If he plant a vineyard, it shall be in "a very fruitful hill," and with "the choicest vine," Isa. v. 1, 2; "a noble vine, wholly a right seed," Jer. ii. 21. When in any kind of straits we have recourse to the creature for supply, either we find it like our Saviour's fig tree, without fruit, or like our prophet's vine, as good as empty, the fruits thereof not worth the gathering, Hos. x. 1. "Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter," Deut. xxxii. 32; full of vanity, vexation, disappointment. Friends fail either in their love, or in their power; people cry Hosanna to-day, and Crucify to-morrow. "Men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree a lie." Counsels elude, or are puzzled with intricacies and unhappy obstacles, like the wheels in Ezekiel's vision, that seem hampered in one another. Armies, like Reuben, "unstable as water," now rise, presently ebb and sink away. Treasures, like the mountains out of which they were first digged, barren and fruitless, fuel rather to feed our sins than water to quench our flames; matter of prey to the wicked, more than of help to the miserable. In one word, take any creature—helps in the world, and there will be something, nay, very much, of defect in them. All existence but God's is mixed with non-existence; and as every man, so every creature besides, is a liar, like Job's brook, (or friends which he compares thereto,) that vanishes into nothing when there is most need of it, Job vi. 15—18; a liar, either by way of perfidiousness, which promises and then deceives; or by way of impotence, which undertakes and then miscarries. But whenever God promises and undertakes to bless any man or any people, he carries on his work to perfection; his blessings are all milk and honey, dew and fatness, wine and oil, the fruits of Lebanon, full of sweetness and maturity. He perfects that which he begins concerning his servants, Psal. cxxxviii. 8; Phil. i. 6. There doth "not one thing" fail "of all the good things" he speaks concerning his people; they all come to pass, and not one faileth, Josh. xxiii. 14. The riches which are gotten by human lusts and sinful resolutions are attended with many and piercing sorrows, 1 Tim. vi. 10; but when God blesses a man with riches, he takes away all the sorrow from it, Prov. x. 22. The gifts of God are all of them like his works, "very good," Gen. i. 31; and bring after them into the soul a sabbath, a rest, and peace.

* Medicamenta quedam prius affligunt ut sanent, et ipsa colliria nisi seuum videndi prius elaudant, prodesse non possunt. Aug. Qu. in Matth. qu. 14. Quo terribi deberet, illo ipso recreatur—contumeliam tenet curatiosis pignus, &c. Scult. cap. 42. Observat. in Matth. de Muliere Syrophenissa. Plures epigramas quoties metimur. Tertul. Apol. cap. ult.

† Ὀλίγοι καὶ πολλῶν δυνατότεροι, ἀρχαῖοι καὶ τοῦ βασιλέως ἰσχυρότεροι, ἀπολαύσαντες πατρίδα καὶ πίστιν μὴ ἀπολαύσαντες ἡγμῶν καὶ ἐλευθερίων, πτωχοὶ καὶ εὐποροὶ, καὶ ἰερατικῶν ἀμείνων, &c. Chrys. de Trib. Pueris. Ser. 2. in Psal. l.

3. We should from hence further learn, to show forth the fruits of this heavenly dew, agreeably to the scope of the several metaphors which the prophet here uses, drawn from the consideration of a garden, forest, fruitful field; similitudes frequently used by the Holy Spirit, to denote the beauty, sweetness, fruit, comfort, shelter, protection, which the church of Christ affords to its members, Isa. xxxv. 1, 2; lviii. 11; Cant. iv. 12, 16; vi. 2; (as, on the other side, the wicked are compared to a dry desert, and barren wilderness, Isa. xxxv. 6, 7; xli. 18; Jer. xvii. 6;) and as these are promises in regard of God, and so matter of comfort, they are duties with respect to us, and so matter of obedience. He promises,

1. That his people shall "grow as the lily;" which is the most beautiful of all flowers, Matt. vi. 28, 29; that they shall be gloriously clothed, like a king's daughter, with the garments of praise, and the spirit of holiness, Isa. lxi. 3; set forth by various metaphors of broidered work, and fine linen, and silk, and ornaments, and bracelets, and chains, and jewels. and crowns, Ezek. xvi. 8—13.

And as it is his promise, so it ought to be our duty and endeavour to adorn the gospel of Christ, to be in his garden as a lily, and not as a nettle or bramble; to walk as becometh godliness; to let our light shine before men, that they may be won to admire the amiableness of the Lord's tabernacle, and glorify God in the hour of their visitation; to be as lights in the midst of a crooked generation, Phil. ii. 15, or as "the lily among thorns," Cant. ii. 2; to make it appear that spiritual wisdom causes the "face to shine," Eccl. viii. 1; that holiness is indeed a most beautiful thing, which commends us to the eyes of God and angels; a robe worn by Christ the King of saints, and by which we are made like to him who is "the chiefest among ten thousand," and "altogether lovely," Cant. v. 10, 16. We should take heed of any thing whereby our holy profession may be blemished, and the name of God through us defiled: of such levity as is inconsistent with the majesty of holiness; such morosity as is inconsistent with the meekness of holiness; such drooping as is inconsistent with the joy of holiness; such stiffness and sourness as are inconsistent with the lenity of holiness. In one word, we should labour by the innocence, purity, elegance, fragrance, fruitfulness; by the winning ingenuity, the mild and humble condescension, the prudent insinuation, the meek, quiet, and graceful demeanour of a holy life; to "show forth the praises of him that hath called" us, and to "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," who, like the fowl, pretend to despise beauty, like dogs, bay at the shining of the moon, and "speak evil of those things which they know not," Jude 10.

2. That his church should "cast forth" her "roots as Lebanon." Though she should have the beauty of the lily, yet she should be freed from its frailness, its aptness to fade and wither, beautiful to-day, to-morrow drooping to death. But she should have stability like the cedar, which is one of the strongest of trees, and least subject to decay; therefore is the church compared to it, Ezek. xvii. 22, 23, and the temple said to be built of it, 1 Kings vi. 15, 16, to signify the strength and duration of the church, against which the gates of hell should not prevail. And we may by the way observe, that most of the things here mentioned by our prophet, are also noted to have been in the temple, or in its services: lilies, 1 Kings vii. 19, 22, 26; olive trees, 1 Kings vi. 23, 32, 33; spices for incense, wheat and oil for meat-offerings, wine for drink-offerings. God thus furnishes his people with those blessings which may be most properly dedicated to him,* teaching us, as often as we receive any gifts from him, presently to inquire what relation they have to his temple, how his name may be honoured, how his church may be served, how his gospel may be furthered, how his people may be edified and comforted by them, how all our enjoyments may be divided as spoils to Christ: the power of great men, Isa. lx. 3; the swords of mighty men, 1 Sam. xviii. 17, 25, 27; Judg. vii. 18; the wisdom of learned men, 1 Kings iii. 9, 28; the cunning of craftsmen, Exod. xxviii. 3; xxxi. 6; the wealth of rich men, Isa. xxiii. 18; Prov. iii. 9; Psal. xiv. 12; Isa. lx. 6, 9; 1 Tim. vi. 17—19. Abraham gave of the spoils to Melchizedek, Heb. vii. 4; and Israel of all their wealth to the tabernacle, Exod. xxxv. 21; and David and his people of their treasure to the temple, 1 Chron. xxix. 2.

And as it is his promise, that the church should thus take root, 2 Kings xix. 30; Jer. xvii. 8; so we should account it our duty to be firm, stable, constant, "unmovable" in the truth, and "in the work of the Lord," as "a house" "founded upon a rock;" to stand "rooted and built up" in the truth, that we may "hold fast the profession" thereof "without wavering;" not being "carried about with every wind of doctrine," but knowing whom and what we have believed, 1 Cor. xvi. 13; Eph. iv. 14; Col. ii. 7; Heb. x. 23; to "stand fast," "being rooted and grounded in" the "love" of God, that we may be "strengthened with might" in his service, and may with "purpose of heart" cleave unto him, being established by his grace, Eph. iii. 17; Col. i. 11; Heb. xii. 28; xiii. 9. In the civil law, till a tree has taken root, it does not belong to the soil on which it is planted. So it is not enough to be in the church, except, like "a cedar in Lebanon," we "cast forth" our "roots," and are so "planted" that we "flourish in the courts of our God," and "bring forth fruit in old age," Psal. xcii. 12—14.

3. That the church should spread forth her branches, and fill the earth, and grow to a great compass and extent, that she should send out "her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river," Psal. lxxx. 8—11; Dan. ii. 35; that his church should be a universal Spolia in templis suspendere antiqui moris erat. Cic. de Nat. Deor. lib. 2. Liv. lib. 10. Virgil. Æn. 7.

Tanta est floribus illi dignitas of Homerus omnes flores voca-verit Leigra. Jul.
Pollex. vid. Pin.
lib. 21. cap. 1.

Pin. lib. 16. cap. 40.
Theophrast. Hist.
Plant. L. 3.

P. De acquirendo
rerum dominio, l. 7.
§ 12. et Arborum
furtim cesarum, l. 3.
§ 3. Cod. de Rei vindicatione, l. 11.

* Τεύχεα συλλίσας, οὕτω ποτὶ Γλιον ἴρην Καὶ κρέμας ποτὶ νῆν' Ἀπολλωνος ἑκάστοιο. Hom. Il. η.

church over the whole world; that as, in regard of sin, the whole world lieth in the wicked one, 1 John v. 19, so it should have Christ for its propitiation, through faith, 1 John ii. 2. Totus in maligno

Aug. Epist. 45. propter zizaniam, Christus propitiatio propter triticum. "By one Spirit are we all baptized into one body," 1 Cor. xii. 13; and that one body made up of "all churches of the saints," 1 Cor. xiv. 33, even of "all nations, and kindred, and people, and tongues," Rev. vii. 9: no difference of persons, "neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free: but Christ all, and in all," Col. iii. 11; no difference of places, "all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours," 1 Cor. i. 2; no difference of times, "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8.

And as this is his promise, so we should endeavour,

1. To grow ourselves in knowledge and grace; to let our profiting appear unto all men; to abound in the work of the Lord; to let our graces from the heart, like leaven from the middle of the lump, spread abroad, and find their way to all the parts and powers of soul and body, that the whole man may be "filled with all the fulness of God," and grow up "unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," Eph. iv. 13—16; Phil. iii. 12—14; 2 Pet. iii. 18; Heb. vi. 1.

2. To promote zealously the growth and progress of the gospel in others. This is the nature of grace, to manifest itself, and by that means to allure and gather others to its own quality. It is set forth in Scripture by the names of light, which shines abroad, of ointment and perfume, which cannot be hid, of leaven, and salt, which impart to other things their own nature and relish. Therefore the Holy Ghost was given in "tongues," "tongues like as of fire," with "a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind;" all which have a quality of self-manifestation, and are calculated to attract attention. There is an excellent place to this purpose in Eph. iv. 15, 16, "But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ: from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love." The apostle thus illustrates the manner of spiritual increase in the mystical body of Christ by the proportion of the growth of members in the natural body, and thereby teaches us, that,

1. There must be a fellowship between the head and members, which, in the mystical body, is here spoken of as twofold, εἰς αὐτὸν, and ἐξ αὐτοῦ; growing "into him," and receiving "from" him; looking in this work of growth on Christ, first, as the end to which all that growth aspires; secondly, as the fountain from whence it proceeds; that by growing we may have a more intimate and strong communion with him, by that virtue which we receive from him. So here are two necessary requisites to this duty of endeavouring the "increase of the body," to have Christ for our end to which we work, and for our fountain out of which we derive our ability of working. Every true member of Christ is intent and vigilant on the interest and honour of Christ; and it belongs to the honour of Christ to have a perfect body. The church is his "fulness," he esteems himself maimed and incomplete if that should be finally deficient in any thing requisite to its integral perfection; and hence it is that every true Christian puts forth the uttermost of his endeavours in his place to carry on the "increase" of his Master's body; as every true-hearted soldier is exceedingly desirous, and, according to his power, endeavours, that every company and regiment under his general's command may be in all its offices and members complete. Again, every member of Christ being to him united, from him receives of his fulness "grace for grace," and so works to the same ends as the Head. And as the water which first rises out of the fountain, stands not still where it began, but goes forward till it grows into a great river; so those who are joined to Christ as a fountain, do, by reason of that vital communion which they have with the fountain, carry on the growth of the whole body; and the more vigorous the life of Christ is in any part, the more actively does that part work towards the edification of the whole.

2. A mutual communion of the members of the body within and amongst themselves: to which is first pre-supposed, the organical and harmonious constitution and compacture of the body into one, out of which arise the form and beauty, the strength and firmness, the order and fitness, that are in it to those works which are proper to it, intimated in those two words συναρμολογημένοι, and συνσβιβασμένοι, "fitly joined together and compacted." It is a metaphor drawn from carpenters and other artificers, who, by several joints, so coaptate and fit the parts of their work to one another, that being put together and fastened, there may one whole structure or body grow out of them; and in that body this accurate fitness and intimate connexion of the parts one with another, produce an excellent strength, a beautiful order, and a ready serviceableness of each part to the other, and of all to the whole. So Jerusalem is said to be as "a city that is compact together," Psal. cxii. 3; as the ark (a type of the church) had the ribs, and planks, and parts thereof so closely fastened into one another, that no water could get in; and as in the tabernacle, all the curtains thereof were to be coupled together, Exod. xxvi. 3. So Christ is all for unity, and joining things into one; two natures united in one person, two parties reconciled by one Mediator, two people concorporated into one church; one family, one Father, one seed, one Head, one faith, one hope, one love, one worship, one body, one Spirit, one end, and one common salvation. Christ is not, loves not to be, divided, 1 Cor. i. 13. This is a fundamental requisite to the growth of the body, to the preservation of its unity. The building must be "fitly framed together," if you would have it grow "unto an holy temple in the Lord," Eph. ii. 21; Col. ii. 19. When there was most unity, there was the greatest increase in the church; when they were all of "one accord," of one heart, and one soul, then "the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved," Acts ii. 46, 47. They that cause divisions and dissensions, do not serve the Lord Jesus, and therefore they cannot but hinder the progress of his gospel, Rom. xvi. 17, 18. As in the natural, so in the mystical body, solutio continuitatis tends to the paining and grieving of that Spirit by which the body lives, and by consequence hinders its growth, Eph. iv. 30, 31. Our growth is by the apostle distributed into growth "in knowledge," and growth "in grace," 2 Pet. iii. 18; and divisions in the church are of themselves great hinderances to both these: to knowledge, because the most usual breaches in the church arise out of diversities of opinion publicly asserted and insisted on by their authors and followers. And though accidentally, where truth is embraced, it is held with more care, and searched into with more accurateness, because of the errors that oppose it (as the fire is hottest in the coldest weather); yet corrupt doctrine, being of the nature of a weed or canker, in spreading and corroding further and further, it must needs consequently hinder the diffusion, and so the growth, of true knowledge. Nor does it less hinder the growth of grace; for while the people of God are all of one heart and of one way, then all their communion

Nulla multitudinis potentia nisi consentientis, id est, unum sentientis.
Aug. de vera Relig. cap. 25.

Vid. Cameron de Eccles. p. 81—86.

runs into this one design of mutually edifying, comforting, supporting, encouraging one another in their "most holy faith;" but when they are divided and broken into factions by different judgments, if there be not a great abundance of humility and spiritual wisdom, the spirits of men run out into heats and passions, into perverse disputes, and mere notional contentions, which have ever been diminutions to the power of godliness, 1 Cor. iii. 3, 4. When there are schisms in the body, the members will not have care

Non tolli Celus ascendit: ita se ad exclamavit, Die aliquid contra ut duo simus. Senec. de ira, 3. lib. e. 8.

of another, 1 Cor. xii. 25. Greatly therefore, even for this one cause, are the sad and dangerous divisions of these times to be lamented, when men make use of civil troubles to disturb, yea, to tear asunder, the unity of the church; when they set up, as in the times of the Donatists, altar against altar, and church against church, and make secessions from the common body, and then one from another, to the infinite content and advantage of the common enemies of our religion, and to the injury of religion itself. It were a blessed thing if we were in a condition conformable to the apostle's exhortation, to "speak all the same thing," to "be perfectly joined in the same mind and in the same judgment," to "be of one mind," and to "live in peace," 1 Cor. i. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11. But if that cannot be attained to, let us yet all learn the apostle's other lesson, wherein we are "otherwise minded," to depend upon God for revealing his will unto us; and whereto we have already attained, "to walk by the same rule," to "mind the same thing," to remember that every difference in opinion does not, ought not to dissipate or dissolve the unity of God's church. Even in Corinth, where the people were divided into several parties, yet they continued "one church," 1 Cor. xi. 18.

The body thus constituted, and compacted for the increase thereof, presents these requisite characteristics.

1. Members severally distinct from one another, some principal, others ministerial, all concurring differently to the service of the whole. If the heart should be in the head, or the liver in the shoulder, if there should be any unnatural dislocation of the vital or nutritive parts, the body could not grow, but must perish. The way for the church to prosper and flourish, is for every member to keep in his own rank and order, to remember his own measure, to act in his own sphere, to manage his particular condition and relations with spiritual wisdom and humility; the eye to do the work of an eye, the hand of a hand. Say not as Absalom, If I were a judge, I would do justice, 2 Sam. xv. 4; but consider what state God has set thee in, and in that walk with God, and adorn the profession of the gospel, Rom. xii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 8; xi. 28, 29; 2 Cor. x. 13, 14; Eph. iv. 7. Remember Uzzah; it was a good work which he did, but because he did it out of order, having no call, God smote him for his error, 2 Sam. vi. 6, 7. There are excellent works, which, being done without the call of God, do not edify, but disturb the body, Rom. x. 15; Heb. v. 4. Every man must walk in the church "as God hath distributed" and "hath called," and "every man" must, "in the same calling wherein he was called," "therein abide with God," 1 Cor. vii. 17, 20, 24.

2. Joints and ligaments so fastening these members together, that each one may be serviceable to the increase of the whole, Col. ii. 19. There are bands which join the body to the Head, without which it can neither grow nor live, namely, the Spirit of Christ, and faith in him, 1 Cor. vi. 17; Rom. viii. 9; Eph. iii. 17: and there are bands which join the parts of the body to one another; as namely, the same Holy Spirit, 1 Cor. xii. 13; which Spirit of grace stirs up every member to seek the growth and benefit of the whole, 1 Cor. xii. 25, 26. The sincere love and truth which each member bears to all the rest, is called "the bond of perfectness," Col. iii. 14, and "the bond of peace," Eph. iv. 3. Now love is a most communicative grace, it will plant, and water, and feed, and spend itself for the good of the whole, it will deny itself to serve the body, (as Christ did,) Gal. v. 13.

3. A measure belonging to every part. Some are in one office, others in another, some have one gift, others another, and all this "for the perfecting of the saints," Eph. iv. 11, 12; 1 Cor. xii. 4, 11: one is able to teach, another to comfort, a third to convince, a fourth to exhort, a fifth to counsel, and every one of these are to be directed to the edification and growth of the whole, Rom. xii. 3-8; Eph. iv. 7. The apostle saith, that we are "fellow citizens with the saints," Eph. ii. 19. Now as amongst fellow citizens there is wont to be an intercourse of mutual negotiation, one man has one commodity, and another another, and with these they usually carry on mutual barter; so amongst the saints, one man is eminent in one grace, another in another, and according to their mutual requirements, or abilities, they interchangeably minister to one another towards the growth of the whole.

Vid. Aristot. Ethic.
1. 3. c. 8.

4. Ἐπιχορηγία, the supply of service and the supply of nourishment which one part affords to another, and so to the whole. This is principally from the Head to the members, called by the apostle, "the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ," Phil. i. 19; of whose fullness we receive "grace for grace," John i. 16; i. to whose image we are transformed "from glory to glory," 2 Cor. iii. 18: but it is proportionably between the members amongst themselves; for as several particular ingredients make up one cordial, and several instruments concur to the perfecting of one ἀποτέλεσμα, or consummate work, and the beauty of every thing arises out of the variety, order, and mutual serviceableness which the parts thereof have one to another; so in the church, Christ has so tempered it together, that they might all stand mutually in need one of another. Therefore we find the saints in Scripture communicating to one another their experiences, temptations, deliverances, comforts, for their mutual edification, Psal. xxxiv. 2, 6; John i. 41, 45; iv. 29; 2 Cor. i. 4, 6; Phil. i. 12-14; Col. ii. 1, 2. And God's dealings with saints in particular are therefore registered in the Scripture, both that we might learn thereby to build up one another, and that by their examples we might support our faith, and through patience and experience of the Scripture have hope, because what has been done to one is in the like condition applicable to every other, James v. 10, 11, 17; Rom. xv. 4; 1 Cor. x. 6; Heb. xiii. 5.

5. Ἐνέργεια, an effectual working, a δύναμις πλαστικὴ or παιτικὴ, a faculty to form and to concoct the matter, which has been administered, to life and nourishment: which is the work of faith, and of the Spirit of Christ; whereby the soul of a believer, being sensible of want, desirous of supply, and pressing forward to perfection, sweetly closes with whatsoever the measure of any other part has communicated to it, converting it to its own growth and nourishment, which the apostle calls the mixing of the word with faith, Heb. iv. 2. Thus far in respect of the growth of the church; but he further promises,

4. That the beauty of his church shall be as "the olive tree;" that as she should have the glory of the lily, the strength and extension of the cedar, so this spreading should not be a vain ostentation, but should have joined with it the flourishing and fruitfulness of the olive. Now the honour of the olive tree consists in two things, perpetual greenness, and most profitable fruit, which serves both for light, to cause the lamp to burn, Exod. xxvii. 20, and for nourishment, to be eaten,

Lev. vi. 15, 16: in the one respect it is an emblem of peace, it makes the face shine, Psal. civ. 15; and in the other it is an emblem of grace, and spiritual gifts, 1 John ii. 20. These are the two most excellent benefits which God promises to his people; "He will speak peace unto" them, Psal. lxxxv. 8; Isa. xxxiii. 17; and he "will give" them "grace and glory," Psal. lxxxiv. 11.

And as he promises, so should we practise these things, and learn to beautify the gospel of Christ, first, with our good works, as the fruits of his grace, John xv. 8; secondly, with our spiritual joy and comfort, as the fruits of his peace; that others, seeing the light and shining forth of a serene, calm, and peaceable conscience in our conversation, may thereby be brought in love with the ways of God. These two mutually cherish and increase one another. The more conscience we make of fruitfulness, the more way do we make for peace; when the waters of lust are sunk, the dove will quickly bring in an olive branch: and the more the peace of God rules in the heart, the more will it strengthen the conscience and care of obedience, from these considerations: first, thankfulness for so great a blessing: secondly, fear to forfeit it: thirdly, wisdom to improve and increase it.

5. That his church shall be in "smell as Lebanon," and that "the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon," as elsewhere we find her compared to a garden of "all the chief spices," Cant. iv. 12, 14; she shall be filled with the sweet savour of the gospel of Christ. "Thanks be unto God," saith the apostle, "which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place; for we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ," 2 Cor. ii. 14, 15: where there are two metaphors, one of a sweet ointment, the other of a triumph. The name of Christ is compared to an "ointment," Cant. i. 3; and the preaching of the gospel, which is making manifest the savour of this ointment, is called the bearing of Christ's name, Acts ix. 15. Now, this sweet savour is annexed to a triumphal solemnity, because in all times of public joy they were wont to anoint themselves with sweet oil, which is therefore called oleum lætitiæ, "the oil of gladness," Psal. xlv. 7; Isa. lxi. 3. (For in times of mourning they abstained from sweet ointments, 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Dan. x. 2, 3.) The gospel therefore being a message of "great joy," Luke ii. 10; a leading of "captivity captive," and the means whereby Christ goes forth gloriously, "conquering, and to conquer," Psal. xlv. 3, 4; ex. 2; Rev. vi. 2; therefore they who brought these good tidings are said to be as a "sweet savour," whose lips drop "sweet smelling myrrh," Cant. v. 13, and whose doctrine is compared to the "powders of the merchant," Cant. iii. 6; and the time of the gospel is called an "accepted time," "the day of salvation," 2 Cor. vi. 2; that is, a time of singular joy and solemnity, a continual Easter, or festival, 1 Cor. v. 7, 8; and herewithal he promises likewise, that his people should offer up spiritual incense and services to him in prayers, thanksgivings, alms, and good works, Ezek. xx. 40.

Conveia, Indi-pocula crebra, unguenta, coronæ, cæta patrum.
Lucret. lib. 4.
Adrant unguenta, coronæ, incensabantur odoris. Cic. Tusc. qu. l. 6. Vid. Athenæum, lib. 15. c. 11, 12.

And as he promises, so we should practise these things. Our care should be to let our lips and lives breathe forth nothing but grace and edification, Col. iv. 6; to be frequent in the spiritual sacrifices of prayer, thanksgiving, and good works, which may be as "an odour of a sweet smell" before God, Phil. iv. 18; Rev. viii. 4; to labour to leave behind us "a good name," not out of vain-glory, or an empty, ambitious affectation of honour, but out of the conscience of a holy life, which makes the name smell "better than precious ointment," Eccl. vii. 1.

6. That "they that dwell under his shadow shall return." Which words admit of a double sense, and so infer a double promise and a double duty. 1. We may by an hyponon-proteron understand the words thus, When Israel have repented and are brought home to God again, they shall have security, defence, protection, refreshment under the comforts of his grace, against all the violence of temptation, as a spreading tree affords a sweet shade to the weary traveller, and shelters him from the oppression of the heat; whereby is signified the secure, quiet, and comfortable condition of God's people under the protection of his providence and promises, Job vii. 2; Isa. iv. 6; Micah iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10.

And as he promises such a condition, so should we in all troubles not trust in an "arm of flesh," or betake ourselves to mere human wisdom and carnal counsels, which are too thin shelters against God's displeasure, or the enemies of the church; but we must fly to him to hide us, we must find spiritual refreshment in his ordinances, promises, and providence, get his wing to cover us, and his presence to be a "little sanctuary" unto us, and "the joy of the Lord" to be our "strength," Psal. lvii. 2; xci. 1; Isa. xxvi. 20; Neh. viii. 10. When the Lord comes out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the land for their iniquity; when flood and fire, storm and tempest, the fury of anger, the strength of battle, are poured out upon a people; when a destroying angel is sent abroad with a commission to kill and slay, Ezek. ix. 5, 6; when Death, the king of terrors, rides up and down in triumph, stripping men of treasures, lands, friends, honours, pleasures, making them a house in darkness, where master and servant, princes and prisoners, are all alike: to have then an ark with Noah, a Zoar with Lot, a Goshen in Egypt; to have one arm of this olive tree spread over us; to have one promise out of God's word, one sentence from the mouth of Christ promising paradise to us, is infinitely of more value to a languishing spirit than all the diadems of the earth, or the peculiar treasure of princes.

2. If we take the words in the order in which they lie, then the mercy here promised is, that when God shall restore and repair his church, they who dwell under its comforts shall return and be converted to the knowledge and obedience which shall be there taught them. When "the branch of the Lord" is "beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the earth excellent and comely," then "he that remaineth in Jerusalem shall be called holy," Isa. iv. 2, 3; then every vessel in Judah and Jerusalem shall be inscribed, "Holiness unto the Lord," Zech. xiv. 20, 21; then "the heart also of the rash shall understand knowledge, and the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak plainly," Isa. xxxiii. 4.

And this should be the endeavour of every one who lives under the shade of this tree, under the purity of God's ordinances, under the pious government and constitution of such a church or family as is here described, especially in these times, when, on the one side, the world is so much loosened and estranged from us, and, on the other side, reformation in the church is so much to be desired, to convert and turn men unto the Lord. All endeavours after reformation in a church are miserably defective, when they come short of this, which should be the ultimate reason of them all, namely, the repentance and conversion to God of those that dwell under its shadow. When God promises to give to his church "the glory of Lebanon," and "the excellency of Carmel and Sharon," the consequence of this beauty and reformation in the church is, "the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water," Isa. xxxv. 2, 5—7. "The wolf," "the leopard," "the lion," "the bear," "the asp," "the cockatrice," shall be so turned from the fierceness and malignity of their natures, that "they shall not hurt nor destroy in all" the "holy mountain," but "a little child shall lead them," Isa. xi. 6—9. It is a great happiness and advantage to live under the shade of a godly government; many have reason to bless God all their days that they were in their childhood trained up in such a school where piety was taught them as well as learning, where they had means as well of conversion as of institution; that they lived in such a family where the master of it was of Joshua's mind, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord," Josh. xxiv. 15. Salvation comes to a whole house when the governor thereof is converted, Luke xix. 9; Acts xvi. 33, 34. I shall never look on a church as effectually reformed, till I find reformation work conversion; till piety and charity, justice and mercy, truth, humility, gentleness, goodness, kindness, meekness, singleness of heart, zeal for godliness and mutual edification, and the life and power of religion, shine forth more conspicuously than before. When the very "headstone" is brought forth, and the last work in the building of the temple finished, yet then must the people cry, "Grace, grace unto it," Zech. iv. 7; intimating that reformation is never indeed consummate till the blessing of God make it effectual to those uses for which it was by him appointed. Church reformation should be like Paul's Epistles, which always close with duties of obedience.

7. That "they shall revive as the corn, and grow as the vine." In which two expressions are set forth two excellent and wholesome consequences of affliction.

1. "The corn," though it die first, and suffer much from frost, hail, snow, tempest, yet, when the spring comes, revives and breaks through all. So God promises to his church, in the saddest condition, a reviving again, and that it shall be brought "forth to the light," Ezek. xxxvii. 12; Micah vii. 9. 2. "The vine," when pruned and lopped, will not only revive and spring again, but will bring forth the more fruit, and cast forth the more fragrant smell. So God promises to his people, not only a reviving out of their afflictions, (hence haply Christ was buried in a garden, to note, that death itself does not destroy our bodies, but only sow them; "the dew of herbs" will revive them again, 1 Cor. xv. 42—44,) but further, a profiting by afflictions, that we may say with David, "it was good for" us, when we find it yield "the peaceable fruit of righteousness" after we have been "exercised thereby," Psal. cxix. 71; Heb. xii. 11.

And as he promises these things, so we should learn to turn these promises into prayer and into practice. When we seem, in our own eyes, cast out of God's sight, yet we must not cast him out of our sight, but, as Jonah in the whale's belly, and as Daniel in Babylon, pray towards his holy temple still, Jonah ii. 4, 7; Dan. vi. 10. The woman of Canaan would not be thrust off with a seeming rejection, nor utterly despond under a grievous trial of faith, but, by a singular acumen and spiritual sagacity, discerned matter of argument in that which looked like a denial, Matt. xv. 27. Soap and fuller's earth, when first put on, seem to stain and soil the clothes, yet their use and end is to purify them. And God's frowns and delays may seem to be the denials of prayer, when haply his end is to make the granting of them more full of profit and comfort. Therefore in all troubles we must not give over looking towards God, but say with Job, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," Job xiii. 15.

And after all afflictions we must learn to evidence their fruit, to come out of them refined, as silver out of the fire; to have thereby our faith strengthened, our hope confirmed, our love inflamed, our fruit and obedience increased, our sins taken away, and our iniquities purged; to be chastened and taught, to be chastened and converted, Isa. xxvii. 9. If we have run away from our duties, and been cast into a whale's belly for it, when we are delivered let us be sure to look better to our resolutions afterwards: "After all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, should we again break" his "commandments?" Ezra ix. 13, 14. As Job's riches after his afflictions, so we should endeavour that our graces after our afflictions may be doubled upon us, and that the scent of our holy example may, like spices bruised, or the grapes of Lebanon crushed in the winepress, spread abroad a more fragrant smell before God and man, as "the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed," Gen. xxvii. 27.

Lastly, He promises that all these should be fruits of Lebanon, of the best and most perfect kind: "The scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon." There are many evidences of the goodness of God even in the lives of pagan men; we read of Abimelech's unwillingness to sin against God, Gen. xx. 4, 6, and of his and Ephron's singular kindness to Abraham, Gen. xx. 14, 15; xxiii. 10, 11, 15. No argument more common than this of the virtues, the temperance, prudence, justice, mercy, patience, fidelity, friendships, affability, magnanimity, of many heathen men; inasmuch that some have presumed so far as to make them ex congruo meritorious, or dispositive to salvation. But all these are but "wild grapes," bitter clusters, the fruits of an empty vine, not worth the gathering in order to salvation. But the graces which God bestows upon his church are of a more spiritual and perfect nature, proceeding from faith in Christ, from love of God, from a conscience cleansed from dead works, from an intention to glorify God and adorn the gospel, from a new nature, and from the Spirit of Christ, conforming his servants to himself. They are not grapes of Sodom, but grapes of Lebanon.

And as he thus blesses us, in the like manner should we serve him; not offer to him the refuse, the halt, and blind, and maimed, for sacrifice; not give unto him of that which cost us nothing; but go to Lebanon for all our sacrifices, "covet earnestly the best gifts," press forward and labour to perfect holiness in the fear of God. Give to him our lilies, the beauties of our minority; and our cedars, the strength of our youth; and our olives, and grapes, and corn, and wine: whatever gifts he has bestowed on us, use them to his service and honour again; nor content ourselves with "the form of godliness," with the morality of virtues, with the outside of duties, with the seeds and beginnings of holiness, (he has none who thinks he has enough,) but strive how we shall outrun one another to Christ, as Peter and John did towards his sepulchre. It was a high pitch which Moses aimed at, when he said, "I beseech thee, show me thy glory," Exod. xxxiii. 18. Nothing would satisfy him but fullness and satiety itself. Be sure that all your graces come from Zion, and from Lebanon, that they grow in Immanuel's land: till Christ own them, God will not accept them. Moral virtues and outward duties, grapes of Sodom, may commend us to men; nothing but inward, spiritual, and rooted graces, the grapes of Lebanon, will commend us to God. To do only the outward works of duty, without the inward principle, is at best but to make ourselves like those mixed beasts, elephants and camels, in the civil law, operam præstant, natura fera est,

Semina non nisi corrupta et dissoluta fructibus surgunt. Grana peregrino servantur; omnia de interitu reformatur. Tertul. Apol. cap. 18.

Vid. Vegam. de Justif. lib. 6. cap. 16, 17, 20. Andrad. Orthodox. Explicat. l. 3. Maldonat. in Johan. 6. 6. Greg. Valent. Tr. 3. disput. 1. Qu. 2. punct. 1. et 4. Erasm. Præf. in Qu. Tusc. Cap. Aug. contra Julian. Peing. l. 4. c. 3.

Leg. 2. P. ad Leg.
Aquil. Senec. de
Benefic. lib. 7. cap.
19.

Vid. Aug. de Civit.
Dei, lib. 5. esp. 19, et passim. Greg.
Armin. 1. dat. 1.
q. 3. art. 2.

which, though they do the work of tame beasts, yet have the nature of wild ones. Moral virtue, without spiritual piety, commends not any man to God; for we are not accepted of him but in Christ, and we are not in Christ but by the Holy Spirit.

Ver. 8. Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? I have heard him, and observed him: I am like a green fir tree. From me is thy fruit found.

The conversion of Israel to God in their trouble was accompanied with a petition and a covenant; a petition imploring mercy and grace from God, and a covenant promising to him thanksgivings and obedience. And God is pleased in his answer to have a distinct respect to both these: for whereas they petition first for pardon, that God would "take away all iniquity," he promises to "heal their backsliding" and to "love them freely;" and whereas they pray for blessings, "receive us graciously;" God likewise makes promises of that in great variety, expressed by the several metaphors of fertility, answering to the name and blessings promised formerly to Ephraim. All this we have spoken of under the four preceding verses.

Now, in this 8th verse, God is pleased not only graciously to accept, but further to put to his seal, and to confirm the covenant which they make, promising that by the assistance of his Spirit they should be enabled to do what they had undertaken. This is the greatest ground of confidence that we can have to bind ourselves in holy covenants to God, even the promise of his strength and assistance enabling us to keep covenant with him. Therefore when David had said, "I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments," there follows a little after, "Accept, I beseech thee, the freewill offerings of my mouth, O Lord, and teach me thy judgments," Psal. exix. 106, 108. David was confident that God would not only accept his covenant, but teach him how to keep it, and that made him the more confidently bind himself by it.

In the original the words are עֲפְרַיִם מֵהֵלֵךְ עִירֵי לְעִבְדֵיכֶם Ephraim, what have I to do any more with idols? which therefore some would have to be the words addressed by God to Ephraim. But there is nothing more usual in Scripture than an ellipsis of the verb; and we find this very verb omitted, and yet necessary to be supplied, Isa. v. 9; and in this place the Chaldee paraphrast, and from him the best interpreters, with our translators, have supplied it thus, "Ephraim shall say:" and so we understand it to be God's confirmation of the promise which penitent Ephraim had made, and his undertaking for him that he should indeed be enabled to perform his covenant.

"What have I to do any more with idols?" It is interrogatio cum indignatione, an interrogation not only importing a negative, I will not any more have to do with them, but also a vehement detestation of them and indignation against them; as that of David to Abishai, 2 Sam. xvi. 10; and that of Elisha to Jehoram, 2 Kings iii. 13; and that of the devil to Christ, Matt. viii. 29.

"With idols." עֲפְרַיִם signifies likewise sorrows and grief of mind, a fit word to express Israel's sin and repentance. What have we to do with these idols and sorrows any more? They can produce no good, they can hear no prayers, they can work no deliverance, they can bring nothing but evil and anguish to us, and therefore we will not follow them or seek to them any more. Here, then, is a solemn detestation, as of all their other sins, so of that especially which had most dishonoured God, most wounded their own consciences, and procured most sorrow to themselves, with God's confirmation of it.

Next follow several promises of special mercies. 1. Of hearing and answering their prayers: "I have heard," or answered, "him," or, as others render it, I will hear him. 2. Of fatherly care and providence over them: "and observed him," or fixed mine eyes upon him. I have strictly considered his condition, that I might proportion thereunto my mercies. This is a significant expression, intimating, first, vigilant care, and most intent and solicitous inspection and providence: "Behold, the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy; to deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine," Psal. cxliii. 18, 19. Secondly, direction and counsel: "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide," or counsel, "thee with mine eye," Psal. xxxiii. 8. Thirdly, honour and exaltation: "He withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous: but with kings are they on the throne; yea, he doth establish them for ever, and they are exalted," Job xxxvi. 7. Lastly, it is an expression for hearing prayers: God is said to have his "eyes open unto the supplications of" his servants, to hearken unto them in all that they call upon him for, 1 Kings viii. 52; and "the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears open unto their cry," Psal. xxxiv. 15. The church had before professed herself to be an orphan, that stood in need of tuition and protection; and here God promises to cast his eye and to place his affection upon her, to look to her, to be her tutor and guardian, to govern her with his special providence and wisdom, to take notice of her wants and supply them, to take notice of her desires and fulfil them, to take notice of her condition, and accordingly in all respects to provide for her. 3. Of refreshment, from the heat and violence of temptations or any kind of afflictions: "I am like a green fir tree," which, being ever green, and casting forth a large shade, affords much comfort and refreshment to the weary traveller. 4. Because the fir tree, though refreshing in respect of its shade, is yet unfruitful, therefore he further promises to be a root of blessings, and all kind of spiritual graces, to them: "From me is thy fruit found," that is, From me is, or shall be, thy fruit, as Mal. ii. 6, 7; 1 Pet. ii. 22; Zeph. iii. 13. The word נִמְצָא "found" may here seem to imply and direct us to an inquiry after the foundation and original of the fruit here mentioned: Though all thy fruit of good works and new obedience may seem to proceed from thyself, and to be thine own, yet if thou be careful to inquire after their root, thou wilt find that they come "from me," though they grow upon thee, and that thou bringest them forth only by the help, supply, and vigour of my grace bestowed on thee; thou doest them, but the power and strength whereby thou doest them proceeds from me.

These words then are the sum of God's answer to the covenant of his people. They "render the calves of" their "lips;" God hears and accepts them: they renounce carnal confidence in men, in horses, in idols; and when they look off and turn away from these, then God looks on them with a fatherly eye of care, providence, counsel, and protection: "I have observed him." They will not "say any more to the work of" their "hands, Ye are our gods," nor any longer make lies their refuge; and God enables them to do as they have said, and affords comfort and refreshment to them, as the shade of a fir tree to a weary traveller. Lastly, they believe and acknowledge that when they are "fatherless," and destitute of all help, there is mercy in God to comfort and provide for best interpreters, with our translators, have supplied it thus, "Ephraim shall say:" and so we understand it to be God's confirmation of the promise which penitent Ephraim had made, and his undertaking for him that he should indeed be enabled to perform his covenant.

Solom. Glasius
Grammat. Sacr. pag.
350, 654.

Gloss. Rhetor. Sacra.
Tract. 2. cap. 5.

It is interrogatio cum indignatione, an interrogation not only importing a negative, I will not any more have to do with them, but also a vehement detestation of them and indignation against them; as that of David to Abishai, 2 Sam. xvi. 10; and that of Elisha to Jehoram, 2 Kings iii. 13; and that of the devil to Christ, Matt. viii. 29.

עֲפְרַיִם signifies likewise sorrows and grief of mind, a fit word to express Israel's sin and repentance. What have we to do with these idols and sorrows any more? They can produce no good, they can hear no prayers, they can work no deliverance, they can bring nothing but evil and anguish to us, and therefore we will not follow them or seek to them any more. Here, then, is a solemn detestation, as of all their other sins, so of that especially which had most dishonoured God, most wounded their own consciences,

Certum est nos
velle cum volumus
sed ille facit ut velimus.
Certum est
nos scire cum fa-cimus, sed ille facit ut sciamus. Aug.

Ipsæ facit ut illi faciant quæ præce-pet: illi non faciunt ut ipsæ faciat quod promittit. Aug. de Frustrat. Sanct.
cap. 10.

them; and this God makes good too. Mercy of protection, "I am like a green fir tree;" and mercy of bounty and benediction, "From me is thy fruit found;" by the one defending them against their fears, by the other enabling them to their duties. Thus does God enlarge and proportion his mercy to the uttermost extent of Israel's prayer or promise, and when they have no help or comfort out of him, he himself becomes "all and in all" to them; making a thorough compensation for every thing which they part with for his sake, and causing them to find in him alone all that comfort and satisfaction to their desires, which in vain they sought for in other things.

The words contain these two general points: First, God's promise, enabling Israel to perform theirs: "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Secondly, God's special regard to their prayers, "I have heard him;" to their persons, "and observed him;" illustrated by two metaphors; the one importing protection and defence, "I am like a green fir tree;" the other, grace and benediction, "From me is thy fruit found."

"Ephraim shall say." This is God's speech and promise, setting to his seal and gracious ratification to the covenant which Israel made, ver. 2, 3, without which it would have been null and void: for as man, by believing, sets to his seal to the truth of God, John iii. 33; so God, by assisting, sets to his seal to the purpose of man: but with this great difference; man's seal is but a subscription and confession of that which was firm before; for all God's promises are "yea and Amen," and faith does not put certainty into the promise of God, Rom. iii. 3, 4; 2 Tim. ii. 13, but into the heart of man concerning the promises, Rom. iv. 16; 2 Tim. i. 12. But God's seal is a confirmation of the promise of man, and a rendering stable that which otherwise would vanish away; all our sufficiency is from him, we can neither will nor do any thing further than we receive from him both "to will and to do," Phil. ii. 13. Pharaoh made promise after promise, and broke them as fast, Exod. viii. 8, 28; ix. 28. Israel one while makes promises, and quickly starts aside like a deceitful bow, as ice which melts in the day and hardens again in the night, Psal. lxxviii. 34—38; Jer. xxxiv. 15, 16; to-day they will, and to-morrow they will not; they repent to-day, and to-morrow they repent of their repenting; like the sluggard in his bed, who puts out his arm to rise, and then pulls it in again; "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep," Prov. vi. 10. So unstable and impotent is man in all his resolutions, till God say Amen to what he purposes, and establishes the heart by his own grace, Heb. xiii. 9. When the waters stood as a wall on the right hand and on the left of Israel as they passed through the Red Sea, this was a work of God's own power; for water is unstable, and cannot keep together, nor be contained within any bounds, by its own consistency. So difficult a work is it for the mutable wills and resolutions of men to be kept close to any pious and holy purposes. Hence,

Obs. 1. A penitent's conversion and covenant of new obedience derive their stability from the promise and free grace of God. They are not sufficiently provided for by any band, obligation, or covenant of our own, whereby we solemnly engage ourselves, except God be pleased by his free grace to establish and enable the heart to their performance. Israel here, in the confidence of God's mercy, prays for pardon and blessings; and in the confidence of his grace, promises reformation and amendment of life; but all this is but like a written instrument or indenture, which is invalid and of no effect till the parties concerned have mutually set to their hands and seals. Till God be pleased to promise us that we shall do that which we have promised to him, and does as it were make our own covenants for us, all will prove too weak and unstable to continue. The grace of God to the purposes of men is like oil to colours in a table or picture, which imparts to them an unfolding freshness.

There is a necessary and indissoluble dependence of all second causes upon the first, without whose influence and concurrence they neither live, nor move, nor have, or continue in, their being, Acts xvii. 28; Heb. i. 3. He who is the first of causes and last of ends, employs and directs the necessary, voluntary, contingent motions and activities of all second causes, to whatsoever ends he himself is pleased to preordain. And this the natural and necessary concatenation of things requires, that that which is the absolute, supremest, first, and most independent will, wisdom, and power of all others, should govern, order, and direct all other wills, powers, and wisdoms, inferior and subordinate to it, to whatsoever uses and purposes he who has the absolute dominion and sovereignty over all is pleased to appoint. It cannot be other than a marvellous diminution of the greatness of God, and a too low esteem of the absoluteness of that majesty which belongs to him, to make any counsels, decrees, purposes of his to receive their ultimate form and stamp from the previous and intercurrent causalities or conditions of the creature. This I have always looked on as the principal cause of those dangerous errors, concerning grace, free-will, and the decrees of God, wherewith the churches of Christ have been so miserably in the former ages, and in this of ours, exercised by the subtlety of Satan, and by the pride of corrupt-minded men; namely, the too low and narrow thoughts and conceptions which men have framed to themselves of God, the not acquiescing in his sovereign dominion and absolute power of disposing all things which he made according to the pleasure of his own will; into which I am sure the Holy Scriptures resolve all, Matt. xi. 25, 26; Rom. ix. 18, 21; xi. 33, 36; Eph. i. 5, 9, 11; Psal. cxxxv. 6.

Even in the sinful actions of men, God's influence and providence have a particular hand: as actions, his influence; as sinful, his providence. 1. His influence, to the natural motion and substance of the action, though not to its wickedness; for this stands not in being or perfection, (else the Fountain of being and perfection must needs be the first cause of it,) but in defect and privation of perfection. As when a hand draws a line by a crooked rule, the line is from the hand, but its crookedness from the rule: or, as when a man goes lamely, the motion as motion is from the natural faculty, but the lameness of the motion is from the defect and viciousness of the faculty. A swearer could not utter an oath, nor a murderer reach out his hand to strike a blow, but by the force of those natural faculties which have all their being and working in and from God; but that these natural motions are by profaneness or malice directed to ends morally wicked, proceeds from the vitiosity and defect which are in the second cause, making use of God's gifts to his own dishonour. 2. The providence of God has a notable hand in the guiding, ordering, and disposing of those actions, as sinful, to the ends of his own glory, in the declaration of his power, wisdom, and justice, to which the sins of wicked men are perforce carried on, contrary to those ends which they themselves in sinning proposed. As an artificer uses the force of natural causes to artificial effects: as a huntsman uses the natural enmity of the dog against the fox or wolf, to the preservation of the lambs, which otherwise would be destroyed; though the dog itself by nature is as great an enemy to the lamb as the fox: as the Pharisees were as great enemies to religion as the Sadducees, yet

Vid. Aug. Enchirid. ad Laurent. c. 95—96.

Vid. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 11. cap. 17. et passim. Quintil. lib. 2. Instit. cap. 13. Pictarch. Sympos. lib. & c. 1.

Paul wisely made use of their enmity amongst themselves, for his own preservation and deliverance from them both : so nothing is more usual than for God to manage and direct the sins of men to the bringing about of his own purposes and counsels, Gen. l. 20; 1 Sam. ii. 25; 1 Kings ii. 26, 27; 2 Sam. xii. 11, compared with 2 Sam. xvi. 22; Isa. x. 5-7; Acts iv. 28; Psal. lxxvi. 10. But now to gracious actions, which belong not at all to nature as nature, but only as inspired and actuated with spiritual and heavenly principles, a more singular and notable influence of God is required, not only to the substance of the action, but more especially to its rectitude and goodness; for we have no sufficiency of ourselves, not so much as to the first offers and beginnings of good in our thoughts, 2 Cor. iii. 5: when we are bid to "work out" our "own salvation with fear and trembling," it must be in dependence on the power and in confidence of the aid of God; "for it is he" who "which worketh in" us "both to will and to do," Phil. ii. 12, 13: when we covenant to turn unto God, we must withal pray to him to turn us, Lam. v. 21; Jer. xxxi. 18. God commands us to turn ourselves, and to make us a new heart and a new spirit, that we may live, Ezek. xviii. 30-32; but withal, he tells us that it is he who gives us one heart, and one way, and a new spirit, that we may walk in his statutes, Ezek. xi. 19, 20; Jer. xxxiii. 39. He gives us posse, velle, agere, proficere: the power, to make us able; the heart, to make us willing; the act, to walk; the proficiency, to improve; the perseverance, to finish and perfect holiness. David cannot run in the way of God's commandments till he enlarge his heart, Psal. cxix. 32. Nothing can find its way to heaven, but that which comes first from heaven, John iii. 13; we cannot give to God any thing but of his own. "Who am I," saith David, "and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? for all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee," 1 Chron. xxix. 14.

For the further understanding of this point, and of the sweet concord and concurrence between the will of man converted, and the effectual grace of God converting, we shall set down these few propositions:

1. That there is in man by nature a power or faculty which we call free-will, wherunto belongs such an indifferency and indeterminacy in the manner of working, that whether a man will a thing or not, choose it or turn from it, he in neither moves contrary to his own natural principles of working. A stone moving downward, moves naturally; upward, contrary to its nature, and so violently. But which way soever the will moves, it moves according to the condition of its creation; when thus it chooses one part of a contradiction, it retains an inward and fundamental habitude to the other, like those gates which are so made that they open both ways. So that as the tongue which was wont to swear or blaspheme, does, when it is converted, by means of the same faculty of speaking, newly sanctified, utter holy and gracious speeches; so the will, which, being corrupted, did choose "evil and only evil," being sanctified, does use the same manner of operation in choosing that which is good: the nature imparted to it at first remaining still one and the same, but being now guided and sanctified by different principles. This we speak only with respect to the natural manner of its working; for if we speak of liberty in a moral or theological sense, it is certain, that the more the will of man observes the right order of its proper objects and last end, the more free and noble it is, the very highest perfection of free-will consisting in an immutable adherence to God as the ultimate end of the creature, and all ability of receding or falling from him being the deficiency, and not the perfection, of free-will. And therefore the more the will of man casts off and rejects God, the more base, servile, and enslaved. In which sense we affirm against the papists, that by nature man, since the fall of Adam, has no free-will or natural power to believe and turn to God, or to prepare himself for faith and conversion.

2. In man fallen, and thereby universally in all his faculties leavened with vicious and malignant principles, there is a native corrupt force, which puts forth itself in resisting all those powerful workings of the word and Spirit of grace, which oppose themselves against the body of sin, and move the will to holy resolutions: for the wisdom of the flesh cannot be subject to the law of God, Rom. viii. 7. The flesh will lust against the Spirit, as being contrary thereto, Gal. v. 17. An uncircumcised heart will always resist the Holy Spirit, Acts vii. 51. There is such a natural antipathy between the purity of the word and the impurity of the will of man, that he naturally refuses to hear, and snuffs at it, and pulls away the shoulder, and hardens the heart, and stops the ear, and shuts the eyes, and sets up strong holds and high reasonings against the ways of God, and is never so well as when he can get off all sight and thoughts of God, and be as it were without God in the world, Jer. v. 3; vi. 10; xvii. 23; xix. 15; Mal. i. 13; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.

3. According to the degrees and remainders of this natural corruption, so far as it is unsoftened and unsubdued by the power of grace, it does proportionably put forth itself in withstanding and warring against the Spirit of God even in the regenerate themselves.* A notable example whereof we have in Asa, of whom it is said, that he "was wroth with" Hanani "the seer, and put him in a prison house," being "in a rage with him because" he reproved him for his carnal confidence, 2 Chron. xvi. 10. And the apostle in many words both states and bewails the warring of this "law of sin" in his "members" against "the law" of his "mind," so that when he did with the one serve the law of God, with the other he served the law of sin, and was unable to do "the good which" he "would," and "the evil which" he "would not" he did by the strength of sin that dwelt in him, Rom. vii. 14-25.

4. The will of God is set forth in Scripture in a twofold point of view: 1. There is voluntas signi, or that will of God whereby he requires us to work, and which he has appointed to be observed by us; his will signified in precepts and prohibitions. "This is the will of God," saith the apostle, "even your sanctification," 1 Thess. iv. 3. So we are said to prove, to try, to do, God's will, or that which is pleasing in his sight, Matt. vii. 21; Rom. xii. 2; John viii. 29. And, 2. There is voluntas beneplaciti, the will of his purpose and counsel, according to which he himself in his own secret and unsearchable good pleasure is pleased to work; for he "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," Eph. i. 11. " whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places," Psal. cxxxv. 6. And no second causes can do any thing else, though they never so proudly break the order of God's revealed will, but what his "hand and counsel determined before to be done," Acts iv. 28. The will of God's precept and command is every day violated, resisted, and broken through by wicked

incommutabili bono, quam cum inde vel ad seipsum referatur. Aug. de Doct. Christ. l. 1. c. 22.

Aug. de Civ. Del. l. 12. cap. 9.

Vid. Calvin. in Ezek. li. 19, 20. et Aug. contr. 2. Epist. Pelag. lib. 1. cap. 2. et lib. 2. cap. 5.

Aquin. Part. 1. qu. 19. art. 1.

Gilbeuf. de Libert. Creat. l. 1. Melior est cum totum liberet sique constrangerit

* Habitat in eis, et mentem resistentem repugnantemque sollicitat ut ipse conflictus, etiamsi non sit damniabilis quia non perfit iniquitatem, sit miserabilis tamen quia non habet

paecem. Aug. de Nupt. et Concupisc. lib. 2. cap. 2. contra Julian. Pelag. lib. 5. cap. 7.

men to their own destruction: "How often would I," "and ye would not!" Matt. xxiii. 37; Jer. xiii. 27. But the will of God's counsel and purpose cannot be resisted or withstood by all the powers of the world; the counsel of the Lord must stand; and those very agents that work purposely to disappoint and subvert it, by those very workings of theirs bring it to pass; and when, by their own intentions, they are enemies to it, by God's wonderful ordering and directing they are executioners of it, Rom. ix. 19; Psal. xxiii. 11; cxv. 3; Prov. xix. 21; Isa. xli. 10; Josh. xxiv. 9, 10.

5. According to this distinction of God's will, we are to distinguish his call. Some are called voluntate signi, by the will of his precept, when they have the will of God made known to them, and are thereby persuaded to the obedience of it in the ministry of the gospel: in which sense our Saviour saith, "Many are called, but few chosen," Matt. xx. 16; and to those who refused to come to him that they might have life, he yet saith, "These things I say, that ye might be saved," John v. 34, 40. Others are called voluntate beneplaciti, ordained first to eternal life by the free love and grace of God, and then thereunto brought by the execution of that his decree and purpose in the powerful calling and translating of them from darkness into light. And this is to be called κατὰ πρόθεσιν,† according to purpose, Rom. viii. 28, namely, the purpose and counsel of showing mercy to whom he will show mercy, Rom. ix. 18.

6. They who are called by the mere outward call or voice of Christ in the evangelical ministry, may, and do, resist this call, and so perish. Chorazin, and Bethsaida, and Capernaum, were outwardly called by the most powerful ministerial means that ever the world enjoyed, both in doctrine and miracles; and yet our Saviour tells them that they shall be in a worse condition in the day of judgment than Tyre, Sidon, or Sodom, Matt. xi. 21, 24. So the prophet complains, "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Isa. liii. 1; which the evangelist applies to the argument of conversion, John xii. 37—41; for so the hand or arm of the Lord is said to be with his ministers, when, by their ministry, men turn to the Lord, Acts xi. 21. And the same prophet again, or Christ in him, complains, "All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people," Isa. lxv. 2; Rom. x. 21: so disobedient and gainsaying, that we find them resolve sometimes directly contrary to the call of God, Jer. ii. 25; xviii. 11, 12; xlv. 15—28; Matt. xxiii. 37.

7. They who are called inwardly and spiritually, with a heavenly call, vocatione altâ et secundum propositum, with such a call as flows from the counsel and purpose of God for their salvation, though they do resist quoad pugnam, though corruption in them strive to bear up against the grace of Christ, yet they do not resist finally and quoad eventum, to the repelling or defeating of the operation of God's effectual grace;‡ but they are thereby framed to embrace, approve, and submit to that call, God himself working a good will in them, captivating their thoughts to the obedience of Christ, and disposing them to that which is pleasing in his own sight, Phil. ii. 13; 2 Cor. x. 5; Heb. xiii. 21.

And this is done by a double act.

1. An act of spiritual teaching, and irradiating the mind and judgment with heavenly light, called by the prophet the putting the law into the inward parts, and writing it in the heart, Jer. xxxi. 33; 2 Cor. iii. 3; and by our Saviour, the Father's teaching, John vi. 45, and the Holy Spirit's convicting of sin, righteousness, and judgment, John xvi. 8—11; and by the apostle, a "demonstration of the Spirit and of power," 1 Cor. ii. 4, a spiritual revelation of wisdom out of the word to the conscience, Eph. i. 17. For though we are to condemn fanatic revelations beside the word, and without it; yet we must acknowledge spiritual revelation, or manifestation of the Divine light and power of the word by the Holy Spirit in the minds of men converted: for the word of God being a spiritual object, does, to the saving knowledge of it, require such a spiritual quality in the faculty which must know it, that it may be able to pass a right judgment upon it; for spiritual things "are spiritually discerned," 1 Cor. ii. 14. It is true that hypocrites, and other wicked men, may have very much notional and intellectual knowledge of the Scriptures, and those holy things therein revealed, Heb. vi. 4; 2 Pet. ii. 21; but none of that knowledge amounts to that which is called the teaching of God, and a spiritual demonstration:§ for the mysteries of the gospel were to this end revealed, that by them we might be brought to the obedience of Christ; and therefore the knowledge of them is never proportionate or commensurate to the object, till the mind be thereby conformed to Christ, till the conceptions which are framed in us touching God, and sin, and grace, and heaven, and eternal things, be suitable to those which were in the mind of Christ. 1 Cor. ii. 16. Evangelical truths are not fitted to mere intellectual, but to practical, judgment. It is such a knowledge of Christ as may fill us with "all the fulness of God," Eph. iii. 18, 19; a knowledge that must work communion with Christ, and conformity unto him, Phil. iii. 10; a knowledge that must produce "a good conversation,"|| James iii. 13. "He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him," 1 John ii. 4. We know not Christ till we know him as our chiefest good, as our choicest "treasure," as our "unsearchable riches," as "elect" and "precious," as "altogether lovely," "the chiefest among ten thousand," and "worthy of all acceptance," in comparison of whom all the world besides is as "dung." The knowledge of Christ is not seeing only, but seeing and tasting, Psal. xxxiv. 8; cxix. 103. And therefore they who, in one sense, are said to have known God, Rom. i. 21, are yet a little after, ver. 28, said not to have God in their knowledge. The philosopher well observes, That such as every man is in himself, such is the end to which he works, and such notions he has of that good which is his end. It is Ἰσοποιὸς ἑαυτοῦ ἰσχυροῦ ἐστὶν, τοιοῦτο ἐστὶ τὸ τέλος φαίνεται ἀναγ. Aristot. l. 3. c. 7.

* Multa fiunt a malis contra voluntatem Dei, sed tantæ esse sapientiæ tantæ quæ virtutis, ut in eos exitus sive fines quos bonos et justos ipse prescivit tendant omnia quæ voluntati ejus videntur adversa. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 22. c. 1. Alii obediunt, alii ligantur; nemo leges omnipotentis evadit. Id. de Agone Christiano, c. 7. Vid. Bradwardin. de Causa Dei, lib. 1. cap. 32. et Hug. de Sanct. Victor. Sum. Sentent. Tract. 1. cap. 13. et de Sacramento. lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 19, 20. et part. 3. cap. 5, 6, 13, 14, 15. Anselm. lib. 1. cur Deus Homo, c. 15. Lombard. lib. 1. dist. 17.

† Vocatio alta et secreta quæ fit ut legi atque doctrinæ accommodemus assensum. Aug. Ep. 107. et de Prædiciat. Sanct. c. 16, 17.

‡ Illud nescio quomodo dicitur, frustra Deum misereri nisi nō velimus. Si enim Deus miseretur, etiam volumus; ad eandem quippe misericordiam pertinet ut velimus. Aug. ad Simplician. lib. 1. qu. 2. Hæc gratia quæ occulte humanis cordibus divina largitate tribuitur, a nullo duro corde respuitur. Ideo quippe tribuitur, ut cordis duritia primitus auferatur. De Prædiciat. Sanct. cap. 8. et contr. 2. Epist. Pclag. lib. 1. cap. 20.

§ Cibus in somnis similimus est cibus vigilantium, quo tamen dormientes non aluntur. Aug. Confess. lib. 3. cap. 6. Sol non omnes quibus lucet etiam calefacit: sic sapientia multos quos docet non continuo etiam accendit. Aliud est multas divitias scire, aliud possidere: nec notitia divitem facit, sed possessio. Bernard. in Cant. serm. 23.

|| Τίθηται ἰσχυροῦ ἡ γνῶσις τοῦ Θεοῦ. Basil. de Martyr. manante. Hominis sapientia pietas est. Aug. Enchirid. cap. 2. de Doctr. Christiana, lib. 2. cap. 6, 7. et lib. 1. cap. 35.

impossible therefore that a wicked, debased heart can ever look on any spiritual object as its last end, or as principally desirable. If I should see a man choose a small trifle before a rich jewel, however he should profess to know the excellency and to value the richness of that jewel, yet I should conclude that he did not indeed understand its worth aright. And, therefore, to the perfect and proper knowledge of supernatural, spiritual things, there is required a special work of the grace and Spirit of Christ opening the heart, and working it to a spiritual constitution proportionable to those truths about which it is conversant.

Deum scire nemo potest nisi Deo docente: sine Deo non crevit actus Deus. Item. l. 4. c. 14. A Deo descendunt est quid de Deo intelligendum sit, quia non, nisi se auctore, cognoscitur. Hæ. de Trin. l. 5.

The Scripture every where attributes this work to God, and his Spirit. It is he that giveth "an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear," Deut. xxix. 4. It is he that giveth "an heart to know" him, Jer. xxiv. 7. It is he that manifests himself to those who love him, John xiv. 21. It is he that reveals to us by his Spirit the things of God, 1 Cor. ii. 10. It is he that gives "us an understanding," 1 John v. 20, and that opens the understanding to "understand the Scriptures," Luke xxiv. 45; Acts xvii. 14. It is he that teaches us to call Christ our Lord, Matt. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xii. 3; for the voice of carnal and corrupt reason is, "We will not have this man to reign over us," Luke xix. 14. Every man naturally frames and shapes his notions of doctrinal matters to the manner of his conscience and conversation, embracing that which is consonant, and rejecting that which is dissonant, Micah ii. 11; Isa. xxx. 10, 11. To the unclean every thing is unclean, because the very "mind and conscience" of such men "is defiled," Tit. i. 15. This, then, is the first work in effectual calling, the opening of the eye of the mind rightly to conceive of the things of God, of the guilt of sin, of the heaviness of wrath, of the peril of perishing, of the momentous import of damnation and salvation, of the things that concern its everlasting peace, of the righteousness of Christ, of the beauties of holiness, of the exceeding abundant weight of glory, of the comforts of the Holy Spirit, and the unspeakable and glorious joy shed abroad in the heart by believing. These truths the heart is so convinced of, as seriously to ponder them; they form the subject of its deepest and most solemn meditations.

2. An act spiritually inclining and effectually determining the will of man to embrace the ultimate dictate of a mind thus enlightened, and to make a most free, spontaneous, and joyful choice of spiritual good things thus rightly apprehended, on a clear and deliberate consideration of their excellency above all other things, Phil. iii. 8. This act of choosing the Lord for our portion and chiefest good, and of cleaving to him, we find often mentioned in the Scripture, Deut. xxx. 19; Josh. xxiv. 22; Psal. lxxxiv. 10; cxix. 30, 31, 173; Acts xi. 23; Heb. xi. 25: for when the soul of a man is so thoroughly, by God's teaching, convinced of the danger and misery of sin, wherein so long as a man continues, he lives only to dishonour God, and to undo himself; of the benefit of righteousness in Christ, whereby he is reconciled to God, and adopted into a glorious inheritance; and of the beauty of holiness, whereby he is conformed to Christ his Head, and fitted for the inheritance; these previous acts of heavenly teaching are always seconded with effectual operations on the will, suitable to themselves: for the liberty of the will does not consist in a peremptory indifference to any object whatsoever, (else there should be no liberty in heaven,) but in this, that being a reasonable appetite, it is apt to be led one way or another, to choose one thing or another, according to the dictates of reason, and servato ordine finis, with subjection to that which is made to appear to be the supreme end and happiness of the soul; for every faculty is naturally subservient to the ultimate good of that nature whereof it is a faculty, and should monstrously exorbitate from its use and end, if it should put forth itself to the destruction, or refuse to close with, that which is the happiness of the soul to which it pertains. As soon as ever, therefore, the Spirit of grace does, by such a spiritual and practical demonstration as has been described, set forth God in Christ as the supreme and most unquestionable end and happiness of the soul, there are, consequently, suitable impressions on the will, determining it to operations conformable to such a beautiful and glorious object, and enlarging it to run to this centre, to renounce all other things, and to cleave to this alone.

And these acts upon the will are effected:

1. By preventing grace, it is bended and excited to heavenly appetitions, and to the choice of such spiritual good things, the sovereign excellencies whereof have been so sweetly represented. Good is the object of the will; we cannot will evil under the notion of evil; and among good things, that which is by the practical judgment resolved to be best, and that by the teaching of God himself, (who neither is deceived, nor can deceive,) becomes the object of the will's election. And thus God, by his exciting grace, works in us ipsum relle, that very act whereby we choose Christ, and subscribe our name in the roll of his soldiers and servants, answering the call of God with a most cheerful consent.

2. By assisting and co-operating grace,* it is further enabled to put forth this good will into deed, and so to work towards its own salvation, Isa. xxvi. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 10.

3. By subsequent grace, it is carried on towards perfection, to finish what was begun, and so to proceed from the beginning of faith in vocation, to the end of faith in salvation, the Spirit of Christ working in us, as he himself did work for us to a consummatum est, "It is finished;" saying "them to the uttermost that come unto God by him," Phil. i. 6; Eph. iv. 13; Heb. vii. 25; xiii. 21.

And by this means the native obstinacy of the will, both in and after conversion, is subdued, so that it neither does nor can overcome the grace of God working effectually with his word. First, because of the purpose of God to show mercy where he will show mercy, which can in no wise be resisted. Secondly, because of the power of God in the effectual applying of that mercy to the souls of men, with admirable sweetness, with undeniable evidence, with ineffable persuasion, with omnipotent and invincible energy, which no hardness of heart is able to refuse, because the proper operation of it is to take away that hardness which would refuse it, and that by an act of power equal to that whereby Christ was raised from the dead, which all the world was neither able to hinder nor prevent, Eph. i. 19; Col. ii. 12; 1 Pet. i. 5. Thus we see, though we desire, and endeavour, and purpose, and covenant conversion and amendment of life; yet the whole progress of conversion, our promises, our covenants, our abilities, our sufficiencies to make good any thing, do all receive their stability from the grace of God.

From whence we learn, First, Not to put confidence in our own studies, vows, purposes, promises of new obedience. "All men are liars," no sooner left to cap. 31. contr. 2. Epist. Pelag. lib. 2. cap. ult. Non mihi sufficit quod semel donavit nisi semper donaverit. Peto ut accipiam, et cum accepero, rursus peto, &c. Hier. Epist.

Operatur Deus in cordibus quod aliud quam voluntatem? Aug. Ep. 107. Certum est non velle eum voluntas, sed ipse facit ut velimus fructuando vires efficacissimas voluntati. Id. de Grat. et Lib. Arbit. cap. 16.

* Cooperando perfect quod operando incipit; ut velimus sine nobis operatur, cum volumus nobiscum cooperatur. Aug. de Grat. et Lib. Arbit. c. 17. Enchirid. cap. 32 de Nat. et Grat.

Vale Aug. de Cor-rup. et Grat. cap. li.

themselves, but they become miserable spectacles of weakness and instability.

Even Adam in innocence, when he was to be supported and persevere by his own strength, though he had no sin or inward corruption to betray him, how suddenly was he thrown down from his excellency by Satan with a poor and slender temptation! how strangely did a creature of so high and noble a constitution exchange God himself for the fruit of a tree, believe a serpent before a Maker, and was so miserably cheated, as to suppose that by casting away God's image he should become the more like him! Who could have thought that David, a man after God's own heart, with one miscarrying glance of his eye should have been plunged into such a gulf of sin and misery? that so spiritual and heavenly a soul should be so suddenly overcome with so sensual a temptation? that so merciful and righteous a man should so greatly wrong a faithful servant as he did Uriah, and then make the innocent blood of him whom he wronged a

Ut Bellerophon lites in seipsum
scriptas ferat.
Hom. li. 2. et Plat.
de Curiositate.

mantle to palliate and to cover the wrong, and use his fidelity to convey the letters and instructions for his own ruin? Who could have thought that Lot, so soon after he had been delivered from fire and brimstone, and vexed with the filthy conversation of the Sodomites, should be himself inflamed with unnatural, incestuous lust? Who could have suspected that Peter, who had his name from a rock, should be so soon shaken like a reed? and after so solemn a protestation not to forsake Christ, though all else should, that he should so soon be driven with the voice of a maid from his steadfastness, and be the first to deny him, and that with oaths and curses? Surely "every man in his best estate is altogether vanity."

Therefore it behoves us to be always humbled in our own sight, and to be jealous, 1. Of our original impotency to the doing of any good, to the forbearing of any evil, to the repelling of any temptation by our own power. "By strength shall no man prevail," 1 Sam. ii. 9. To be "sinners," and to be "without strength," are terms equivalent in the apostle, Rom. v. 6, 8. Nay, even where there is a will to do good, there is a defect of power to perform it, Rom. vii. 18; our strength is not in ourselves, but "in the Lord, and in the power of his might," and in the working of his Spirit in our inner man, Eph. vi. 10; iii. 16; Phil. iv. 13. If but a good thought arise in our mind, or a good desire and motion stir in our heart, or a good word drop from our lips, we have great cause to take notice of the grace of God that offered it to us, and wrought it in us, and to admire how any of the fruit of paradise could grow in so heathy a wilderness.

2. Of our natural antipathy and reluctance to holy duties; our aptness to "draw back unto perdition," to refuse and thrust away the offers and motions of grace; our rebellion which arises from the "law in" the "members" "against the law of" the "mind," Rom. vii. 23; the continual droppings of a corrupt heart upon any of the tender buds and sproutings of piety that are wrought within us: our aptness to be "weary" of the yoke, and to shake off the burden of Christ from our shoulders, Isa. xlii. 22; our natural levity and inconstancy of spirit in any holy resolutions, continuing but as "the early dew," which presently is dried up; beginning in the Spirit and ending in the flesh, having interchangeable fits of the one and the other; like the chameleon, now of one colour, again of another; now hot with zeal, now cold with security; now following Moses with songs of thanksgiving for deliverance out of Egypt, and quickly after thrusting Moses away, and in heart returning to Egypt again.* Such a decomposedness and natural instability there is in the spirit of man, that, like strings in an instrument, it is apt to be altered with every change of weather, nay, while you are playing on it, you must ever and anon new screw it; like water heated, which is always tending to reduce itself to its own coldness. No longer sun, no longer light; no longer Christ, no longer grace: if his back be at any time on us, our back will immediately be turned on him; like those forgetful creatures in Seneca, who, even while they are eating, if they happen to look aside from their meat, immediately lose the remembrance of it, and go about seeking for more.

3. Of the manifold decays and abatements of the grace of God in us; our aptness to leave our "first love," Rev. ii. 4. How did Hezekiah fall into an impolitic vain-glory,† as soon as God left him to himself, in showing all his treasures to the ambassadors of a foreign prince, thereby kindling a desire in him to be master of so rich a land! 2 Kings xx. 12, 13. How quickly, without continual husbandry, will a garden or vineyard be wasted and overgrown with weeds! How easily is a ship, even at the very shore, carried with a storm back again into the sea! How quickly will a curious watch, if it lie open, gather dust on the wheels and become out of order! Though, therefore, thou have found sweetness in religion, joy in the Holy Spirit, comfort, yea, heaven, in good duties, power against corruptions, strength against temptations, triumph over afflictions, assurance of God's favour, vigour, life, and great enlargement of heart in the ways of godliness; yet for all this "be not high-minded, but fear." Remember, the flower that is wide open in the morning when the sun shines upon it, may be shut up in the evening before night come. If the sun had not stood still, Joshua had not taken vengeance on the enemy, Josh. x. 13; and if the Sun of righteousness do not constantly shine on us and supply us, we shall not be able to pursue and carry on any victorious affections. While God openeth his "hand" thou art "filled," but if he hide his "face" thou wilt be "troubled" again, Psal. civ. 28, 29. Therefore take heed of resting on thine own wisdom or strength. Thou mayst after all this grieve the Spirit of God, and cause him to depart and hide himself from thee; thou mayst fall from thy steadfastness, and lose thy wonted comforts; thou mayst have a dead winter on the face of thy conscience, and be brought to such a sad and disconsolate condition, as to conclude that God hath "east" thee "out of" his "sight," that he hath "forgotten to be gracious," and hath "in anger shut up his tender mercies;" to roar out for anguish of spirit as one whose "bones" are "broken;" thy soul may draw "nigh unto the grave," and thy life to the destroyers, and thou mayst find it a woeful and almost insuperable difficulty to recover thy life and thy strength again. It was so with Job, chap. x. 16, 17; xiii. 26, 27; xvi. 9, 13; xxx. 15, 31; xxxiii. 19—22: it was so with David, Psal. li. 8; lxxvii. 2—4: it was so with Heman, Psal. lxxxviii., and divers others; see Psal. cii. 3, 11; Isa. liv. 6, 11; Jonah ii. 3, 4. Therefore we should still remember in a calm to provide for a storm; to stir up the graces of God continually in ourselves, that they be not

* Μοχθηροί ἐν βίβαιον οὐκ ἔχουσιν οὐδὲ γὰρ αὐτοῖς δια-μύνουσιν οἰκιστοὶ οὐκ εἰσι. Aristot. Eth. l. 8. Στασιάζει αὐτὸν ἢ ψυχῇ. Id. l. 9. c. 4. Hoc habet inter cetera boni mores, placet sibi et permanent. Levis est malitia, saepe mutatur. Senec. Epist. 47. Maximum indicium est malae mentis, fluctuatio. Epist. 120. Vid. Athenæum, l. 7. c. 19.
Tertul. de Pall. c. 3.

† Lege imperiali interdicta vini, olei, liquaminis exportatio, ne barbari gustu illicti promissus invaderent fines Romanorum.
Leg. l. Cod. quae res exportari non debeat. Et apud Chineses, exteri in loca regni interiora non admittuntur, tantum in oris maritimus conceditur commercium. Boterus in catalog. Imperiorum.

quenched, 2 Tim. i. 6; so to rejoice in the Lord, as withal to "work out" our "salvation with fear and trembling," Psal. ii. 11; Phil. ii. 12, 13: never to let the grace of God puff us up, or make us forgetful of our own weakness; but, as the apostle saith of himself in regard of God's grace, "when I am weak, then am I strong," 2 Cor. xii. 10, so to say of ourselves in regard of our own natural corruption, when I am strong, then am I weak.

Secondly, This must not so humble us as to deject and dismay us, or make us give over the hope of holding out to the end, although our nature is so weak, our enemies so strong, our temptations so many: but we must withal be quickened by these considerations, with prayer to implore, and with faith to rely on and draw, strength from the word and grace of God; to have always the window of the soul open toward the Sun of righteousness, whereby the supplies of his grace to prevent, excite, assist, follow, establish us, and carry on every good thing which he has begun for us, may be continually admitted. This is one of the most necessary duties for a Christian, to hold constant and fixed purposes in godliness: the Scripture frequently calls upon us for them; that "with purpose of heart" we "would cleave unto the Lord," Acts xi. 23; that we would "continue in the grace of God," Acts xiii. 43; that we would be "rooted and grounded in love," Eph. iii. 17; that we would "hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering," Heb. x. 23; that we would be "stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord," 1 Cor. xv. 58; that we would look to ourselves, that we "lose not those things which we have wrought," 2 John 8; that we would "hold fast" and "keep" the "works" of Christ "unto the end," Rev. ii. 25, 26. And it is that which godly men are most earnestly solicitous about, and do strive after with the greatest importunity: "I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress," Psal. xvii. 3. "Unite my heart to fear thy name," Psal. lxxxvi. 11. "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise," Psal. lvi. 7. Therefore in this case it is necessary for us to draw nigh to God, who only can ratify all our pious resolutions; who "giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might" "increaseth strength," Isa. xl. 29; who only can settle and establish the hearts of men, 1 Pet. v. 10. The conscience of our duty, the sense of our frailty, the power, malice, and cunning of our enemies, the obligation of our covenant, should direct the soul perpetually to God for the supply of his grace, that that may in all our weaknesses be sufficient for us, and "hold" us "up" that we may be "safe," and may never through infirmity or instability of spirit violate our own resolutions, Psal. cxix. 117.

Thirdly, This is matter of great comfort to the godly, that in the midst of so many temptations, snares, impediments, amongst which we walk, not only the safety of our souls and security of our eternal salvation, but even our present condition in this life, our conversion, our obedience, all our pious purposes of heart, all the progress which we make in a holy conversation, do not depend on the weakness and uncertainty of a human will; but upon the infallible truth, the constant promise, the immutable purpose, the invincible power, the free love, the absolute grace, the omnipotent wisdom and working of God, who doth according to his own pleasure both in heaven and earth, and worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed," Mal. iii. 6. We poor and weak men change with every wind, strong to-day, and weak to-morrow; fixed and resolute to-day, shaken and staggering to-morrow; running forward to-day, and revolting as fast to-morrow; no hold to be taken of our promises, no trust to be reposed in our covenants.

Like Peter on the water, we tread securely one step, and, our faith failing, sink the next. All our comfort is this, our strength and standing rest not on ourselves, but on the rock whereon we are built, and in the power of God, by which we are "kept through faith unto salvation," "out of" whose "hand" none are able to "pluck" us; our very actions are wrought in us, and carried on to their end by the power of Christ, who has mercy, wisdom, and strength enough to rescue us, as from the power of hell and death, so from the danger of our own fickle and froward hearts. To see a man when he is half a mile from his enemy draw a sword to encounter him, or take up a stone to hit him, would be but a ridiculous spectacle; for what could he do with such weapons by his own strength at such a distance? But if he mount a cannon, and point that level against the enemy, this we do not wonder at, though the distance be so great; because though the action be originally his, yet the effect of it proceeds from the force of the materials and instruments employed, to wit, the powder, the bullet, the fire, and the cannon. It seemed absurd in the eye of the enemy, for little David, with a shepherd's bag and a sling, to go against Goliath, an armed giant; and it produced in his proud heart much disdain. But when we hear David mention the name of God, in the strength and confidence whereof he came against so proud an enemy, this makes us conclude weak David strong enough to encounter great Goliath, 1 Sam. xvii. 40-47. It is not our own strength, but the love of God, which is the foundation of our triumph over all our enemies, Rom. viii. 35-39.

But here some will say, Then we may be secure; if God's grace and power be our alone strength, then let us commit ourselves and our salvation to him, and in the mean time give over all thoughts and care of it ourselves, and live as we list; no act of ours can frustrate the counsel or the love of God. To this we answer with the apostle, "God forbid." Though the enemies of free grace do thus argue, yet they who have indeed the grace of God in their hearts have "not so learned Christ." For it is against the essential nature of the grace and Spirit of Christ, to suffer those in whom it dwells to give themselves over to security and neglect of God; for grace is a vital and active principle, and does so work in us as withal to dispose and direct us to working also. The property of grace is to fight against and to kill sin, as being most extremely contrary to it; and therefore it is a most irrational mode of arguing, to argue from the being of grace to the life of sin. "How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" Rom. vi. 2. If we be dead to sin, this is argument enough, in the apostle's judgment, why we should set our affections on things above, Col. iii. 2, 3. The grace of God not only serves to bring salvation, but to teach us to deny "ungodliness and worldly lusts," and to "live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world," Tit. ii. 11, 12. He who has decreed salvation as the end, has decreed also all the antecedent means to that end, to be used in a manner suitable to the condition of reasonable and voluntary agents; to whom it belongs, having their minds by grace enlightened, and their wills by grace prevented, to co-operate with the same grace in the further pursuance of their salvation. And if at any time corruption should in God's children abuse his grace and efficacy to such presumptuous resolutions, they would quickly rue so unreasonable and carnal a way of arguing, by the woeful sense of God's displeasure in withdrawing the comforts of his grace from them, which would make them ever after take heed how they again turned the grace of God into licentiousness. Certainly, the more the servants of God are assured of his assistance, the more careful they are in using it to his own service. Who more sure of the grace of God than the apostle Paul, who gloried of it as of that which made him what he was, "By the grace of God I am what I am," who knew that God's "grace" was "sufficient" for him, and that nothing could "separate" him "from the love of Christ;" who knew whom he had believed, and that "the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant" towards him? and yet who more tender and fearful of sin than he? who more set against corruption, more abundant in duty, more pressing to perfection? This is the nature of grace, to animate and actuate the faculties of the soul in God's service, to ratify our covenants, and to enable us to perform them.

Fourthly, As it is singular comfort to the servants of God, that their own wills and purposes are in God's keeping, and so they cannot ruin themselves; so is it also, that all other men's wills and resolutions are in God's keeping too, so that they shall not be able to purpose or resolve on any evil against the church, without leave from him. So then, 1. When the rage and passions of men break out, tribe divided against tribe, brother against brother, father against child, head against body; when the band of unity which was wont to knit together this flourishing kingdom, is broken like the prophet's staff, and therewithal the beauty of the nation miserably withered and decayed, (for these two go still together, Beauty and Bands, Zech. xi. 10—14,) we must look on all this as God's own work. It was he that "sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem," for the mutual punishment of their sins, Judg. ix. 23. It was he who "turned" the "hearts" of the Egyptians "to hate his people, and to deal subtly with his servants," Psal. cv. 25. He sent the Assyrian against his people, giving them "a charge to take the spoil, and to take the prey, and to tread them down like the mire of the streets," Isa. x. 6. He appointed the sword of the king of Babylon, by his overruling direction, to go against Judah, and not against the Ammonites, Ezek. xxi. 19, 22. He, by the secret command of his providence, marked some for safety, and gave commission to kill and slay others, Ezek. ix. 4, 5. It is he who giveth "Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers," and poureth out "upon him the strength of battle," Isa. xlii. 24, 25. If there be "evil in a city," in a kingdom, "the Lord hath done it," Amos iii. 6; Isa. xiv. 7. This consideration is very useful both to humble us, when we consider that God has a controversy against the land, and that it is he with whom we have to do in these sad commotions that are in the kingdoms; and to quiet and silence us, that we may not dare to murmur at the course of his wise and righteous proceedings with us; and to direct us, with prayer, faith, and patience, to implore, and in his good time to expect, such an issue and close, as we are sure shall be for his own glory, and for the manifestation of his mercy towards his people, and his justice towards all that are implacable enemies to Zion.

2. In the troubles of the church this is matter of singular comfort, that however enemies may say, This and that we will do, hither and thither we will go; though they may combine together, and be mutually confederate, and gird themselves, and take counsel, and speak the word, yet in all this God has the casting voice, Psal. lxxxiii. 2—5. There is little heed to be given to what Ephraim saith, except God say the same: without him, whatsoever is counselled, "shall come to nought;" whatsoever is decreed or spoken, "shall not stand," Isa. viii. 9, 10. We have a lively hypotyposis or description of the swift, confident, and furious march of the great host of Sennacherib towards Jerusalem, with the terror and consternation of the people in every place where they came, weeping, flying, removing their habitations; and when he is advanced to Nob, from which place "the hill of Jerusalem" might be seen, he there shook his hand against "the mount of the daughter of Zion," threatening what he would do unto it. And then when the waters were come to the very neck, and the Assyrian was in the height of his pride and fury, God sent forth a prohibition against all their resolutions, and that huge army, which was for pride and number like the thick trees of Lebanon, were suddenly cut down by "a mighty one," to wit, by the angel of the Lord, Isa. x. 28—34, compared with Ezek. xxxi. 3, 10; Isa. xvii. 12—14; xxxvii. 36. Therefore,

3. Our greatest business is to apply ourselves to God, who alone is "the Lord that healeth" us, who alone can join the two sticks of Ephraim and Judah, and make them one, Exod. xv. 26; Ezek. xxxvii. 19; that he would still the raging of the sea, and command a calm again. He can say, "Ephraim shall say" thus and thus: he has the hearts of kings, and consequently of all other men, in his hands, Prov. xxi. 1; and he can turn them, "as the rivers of water," "whithersoever he will," as men by art can derive waters, and divert them from one course to another, (as Herodot. lib. 1.

Xenophon, Cyropæd. lib. 7. Soltanus.
Anno mundi 3515.
p. 2. et 3516. p. 22.
Sir W. Raleigh, lib. 3. cap. 3. § 6.

they did in the siege of Babylon, as historians tell us, and the Scriptures seem to confirm it, Isa. xliiii. 15, 16; xlv. 27, 28; Jer. l. 23; li. 36.) so he can sway, alter, divert, overrule the purposes of men as it pleases him; reconciling lambs and lions to one another, Isa. xi. 6; making Israel, Egypt, and Assyria agree together, Isa. xix. 24, 25. He can say to Balaam, Bless, when his mind was to curse, Josh. xxiv. 9, 10; he can turn the wrath of Laban into a covenant of kindness with Jacob, Gen. xxxi. 24, 44; and when Esau had the desired opportunity to execute his threats against his brother, he can then turn resolutions of cruelty into kisses, Gen. xxxiii. 4; and when Saul has compassed David and his men round about, and is most likely to take them, he can even then draw him off by a necessary diversion, 1 Sam. xxiii. 26—28. This is the comfort of God's people, that whatever men say, except God say it too, it shall all come to nothing. He can "restrain the wrath of man" whensoever it pleases him; and he will do it, when it has proceeded so far as to glorify his power, and to make way for the more notable manifestation of his goodness to his people, Psal. lxxvi. 10. And thus far of God's answer to the covenant of Ephraim. They promised to renounce idols, and here God promises that they should renounce them. But we shall here further, from the words themselves, more particularly,

Obs. 2. In true conversion God makes our special sin to be the object of our greatest detestation: "What have I to do any more with idols?" This point has been fully opened before.

Obs. 3. It is the nature of true repentance, to break sin off, Dan. iv. 27, and not to suffer a man to continue any longer in it, Rom. vi. 1, 2: "What have I to do any more with idols?" It makes men esteem "the time past of" their "life may suffice" them "to have wrought the will of the Gentiles," 1 Pet. iv. 2, 3; and is exceeding thrifty of the time to come, so to redeem it as that God may have all: it does not linger, nor delay, nor make objections, nor raise doubts whether it be seasonable to go out of Egypt and Sodom, or no; it uses not the sluggard's language modo et modo, "Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep;" nor Agrippa's language, "Almost thou persuadest me;" nor Felix's language, "When I have a convenient season I will call for thee:" but "immediately" resolves, with Paul, not to confer "with flesh and blood," Gal. i. 16; makes haste to flee from the wrath to come, while it is yet to come, Luke iii.

7. It makes no anxious nor cavilling questions. What shall I do for the hundred talents? how shall I maintain my life, my credit, my family? how shall I keep my friends? how shall I preserve mine interests, or support mine estate? but ventures the loss of all for "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ," Matt. xiii. 46; Phil. iii. 7, 8; it is contented to part with a sky full of stars for one Sun of righteousness. The converts that return to Christ, come like "dromedaries," like "doves," like "ships;" no wings, no sails, can carry them fast enough from their former courses unto him, Isa. lx. 6-9. Abraham "rose up early in the morning," though his duty involved the sacrificing of his only son, Gen. xxii. 3. David "made haste, and delayed not to keep" God's "commandments," Psal. cxix. 60. When Christ called his disciples, "they straightway left their nets," their "ship, and their father, and followed him," Matt. iv. 20, 22. Such is the mighty power of repentance; it does not give dilatory answers; it does not say to Christ, Go away now, and come to-morrow, then I will hear thee; I am not yet old enough, or rich enough, I have not gotten yet pleasure, or honour, or profit, or preferment enough by my sins; but presently it hears and entertains him. I have sinned enough already to condemn, to shame, to slay me; I have spent time and strength enough already upon it, for such miserable wages as shame and death come to; therefore I will never "any more" have to do with it. This is the sweet and most ingenuous voice of repentance; "That which I see not teach thou me; if I have done iniquity, I will do no more," Job xxxiv. 32. There is no sin more contrary to repentance than apostasy; for "godly sorrow worketh repentance to salvation," which the soul never finds reason to repent of, 2 Cor. vii. 10, 11. Let us, therefore, "take heed" of "an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God," Heb. iii. 12; and of drawing "back unto perdition," Heb. x. 39; of dismissing our sins, as the Jews did their servants, Jer. xxiv. 16, and calling them back again; for Satan usually returns with seven more wicked spirits, and maketh "the last state" of such a man "worse than the first," Luke xi. 26. Ground which has been a long time laid down from tillage to pasture, if afterwards it be new broken, will yield a much greater crop of corn than it did formerly when it was a common field; and so the heart which has been taken off from sin, if it return to it again, will be much more fruitful than before. As lean bodies have many times the strongest appetite, so lust, when it has been kept lean, returns with greater hunger to those objects which feed it. A stream which has been stopped, will run more violently being once opened again. Therefore in repentance we must shake hands with sin for ever, and resolve never more to tamper with it. But further,

Obs. 4. God hears and answers the prayers of penitents only: "I have heard him, and observed him." When a man resolves, I will have no more to do with sin, then, not till then, does his prayer find way to God. Impenitence clogs the wing of devotion, and stops its passage to heaven. The person must be accepted before the petition: Christ Jesus is the priest that offers, and the altar which sanctifies, all our services, 1 Pet. ii. 5; Isa. lvi. 7; and Christ will not be their advocate in heaven, who refuse to have him as their king on earth. The Scripture is on no point more express than on this. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me," Psal. lxxvi. 18: prayer is a pouring out of the heart; if iniquity be harboured there, prayer is obstructed, and if it do break out, it will have the scent and savour of that iniquity upon it. "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord," Prov. xv. 8, both because it is impure in itself, and because it has no altar to sanctify it. "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination," Prov. xxviii. 9. Great reason that God should refuse to hear him who refuses to hear God; that he who will not let God beseech him (as he does in his word, 2 Cor. v. 20) should not be allowed to beseech God, Prov. i. 24, 28; Isa. i. 15. His ear is not heavy that "it cannot hear," but iniquity separates between us and him, and hides his face that "he will not hear," Isa. lix. 1, 2; Ezek. viii. 18. "God heareth not sinners," John ix. 31; the prevalence of prayer is this, that it is the prayer of "a righteous man," James v. 16. And indeed no wicked man can pray in the true and proper notion of prayer. It is true, there is a kind of prayer of nature, when men cry in their distresses to the God and author of nature, for such good things as nature feels the want of, which God, in the way of his general providence and common mercies, is sometimes pleased to answer suitably to the natural desires of those that ask them. But "the prayer of faith" (which is the true notion of prayer, Rom. x. 14; James v. 15) goes not to God as the author of nature, but as the God of grace, and the Father of Christ; and puts not up mere natural, but spiritual requests to him, as to a heavenly Father, which requests proceed from the Spirit of grace and supplication, teaching us to pray as we ought, Zech. xii. 10; Rom. viii. 26, 27; Gal. iv. 6; so that they who have not the Spirit of Christ, enabling them to cry, "Abba, Father," are not able to pray a prayer of faith. Prayer, when right, has two wills concurring in it, our will put forth in desires, and God's will respected as the rule of those desires; for we are not allowed to desire what we will ourselves of God, but we must ask "according to his will," 1 John v. 14. Now, whensoever impenitent sinners pray for spiritual things, they ever pray contrary to one of these two wills: when they pray for mercy and pardon, they pray against God's will, for that which God will not give; for mercy is proposed to and provided for those that forsake sin, Prov. xxviii. 13; he who chooses to hold fast sin, does by his own election forsake mercy; for "the goodness of God leadeth to repentance," Rom. ii. 4: God's mercy is a holy mercy, it will pardon sin forsaken, but it will not protect sin retained. Again, when they pray for grace, they pray against their own will, for that which they themselves would not have: it is impossible that a man should formally will the holding fast and continuing in sin, (as every impenitent man does,) and with the same will should truly desire the receiving of grace, which is destructive to the continuance of sin. If a wicked man do truly will the grace of God when he prays for it, why does he refuse the same grace when he hears it in the ministry of the word offered to him? If God offer it, and he desire it, how comes it not to be received? Certainly, there is not any thing in the corrupt heart of man by nature, which can willingly close with any sanctifying grace of the Spirit of Christ. Self-denial is a concomitant in all acts of grace, and self-seeking in all acts of lust; and therefore, where there is nothing but lust, there can be no real volition of grace, which is so contrary to it.

This teaches us to have penitent resolutions, and spiritual aims, in all our prayers, if we would have them prevail at the throne of grace. We are now under the heavy calamity of a civil war, and very desirous we are that it should be removed. We suffer, and languish, and fret, and pine away, and we complain every where of want and violence; but who set themselves to cry mightily to God, and call on their souls, as the mariners on Jonah, "What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, call

*Volente erat eos
quidem, pure manus non erant sacra scimus. Basilus de
F. mod. lib. I.
Et in impio Initia
tionis acritas professus. Tertul. Apol.
Quotum a pre-sente factum ab omnibus hinc longe omnis. Id.*

*Interdum christi peccatis, quod recu-saremus si qua of-ferret—multa valeri voluntus velle, sed nolumus—Sæpe
alios votum, aliud optamus, et verum ne illis quidem dici-
mus. Sen. Epist. 95.*

on thy God?" Haply we go so far, we pray, and yet receive no answer, because we "ask amiss," James iv. 1—3. We are troubled that our lusts are abridged of their fuel, or that our nature is deprived of her necessaries, and for these things we pray; but till our troubles bring us to seek God more than ourselves, make us more sensible of his wrath than of our own wants, more displeas'd at what offends him than at what pinches and oppresses ourselves, we cannot promise ourselves an answer of peace. The mariners cried, and the tempest continued still; Jonah was to be cast over; so long as there was a fugitive from God in the ship, the storm would not cease. Never can we promise ourselves any comfortable fruit from our prayers till the aim of them is spiritual, that God may be honoured, that his church may be cleansed and reformed, that our lives may be amended, that whatsoever forsakes God in us may be cast away. Till God's "whole work" be "performed upon Mount Zion and on Jerusalem," we cannot promise ourselves that he will call in his commission and charge to take the spoil and the prey, Isa. x. 12. And therefore our greatest wisdom is to consider what God calls for, to make it our prayer and endeavour that his will and counsel may be fulfilled. The more we make God our end, the sooner we shall recover our peace.

Obs. 5. Our performance of duty depends much on God's hearing and answering our prayers. Ephraim will have no more to do with idols, because God has heard him. Prayer is the key of obedience, and the introduction to duty. The principles of duty are, Wisdom to know and order; will to desire and intend; strength to perform and persevere: and all these are the product of prayer. "If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God," James i. 5. So Solomon, 1 Kings iii. 9. And, "Who am I, and what is my people," saith David, "that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort? for all things come of thee," 1 Chron. xxix. 14. And the apostle prays for the Ephesians, that God would "grant" them, "according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man," Eph. iii. 16. The principles of duty are the fruits of prayer, and therefore the performance of duty much depends on the hearing and answering of prayer.

Obs. 6. When we renounce all carnal and sinful confidences, and cast ourselves wholly upon God, engaging his eye of favour and providence to us, this will be a most sufficient protection against all the cruelties of men: "I have observed him." One would think, when we hear a sword threatened, dashing of infants, ripping of women, the prophet should have called on them to take to them weapons to make resistance; (and certainly the use of means in such cases is necessary; the sword of the Lord does not exclude the sword of Gideon;) one would think, I say, "Take with you words," were but a poor preparation against a destroying enemy: yet this is all that the prophet insists on; When the Assyrian comes against you, do you "take with you words;" your lips shall be able to defend more than his armies can annoy. Words uttered from a penitent heart in times of trouble to God, are stronger than all the preparations of flesh and blood, because that way which prayer and repentance go, that way goes God too. Amalek fights, and Moses speaks to God in the behalf of Israel, and the lifting up of his hands prevails more than all the strength of Israel besides, Exod. xvii. 11, 12. One man of God that knows how to manage the cause of Israel with him, is "the chariot of Israel, and the horseman thereof," 2 Kings ii. 12. What huge armies did Asa and Jehoshaphat vanquish by the power of prayer! 2 Chron. xiv. 9—15; xx. 1—30. Till God forbid prayer, as he did to Jeremiah, chap. vii. 16; xi. 14, and take off the hearts of his servants from crying to him in behalf of a people, we have reason to hope that he will at last entertain thoughts of mercy towards them, Exod. xxxii. 10, 14; and in the mean time, when they are reduced to the condition of fatherless children, he will be their guardian, his eye of providence and tuition will observe them and take care of them. "A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation," Psal. lxxviii. 5.

Obs. 7. Whatsoever human wisdom, wealth, power, or other outward means men have wherewith to defend themselves, yet they shall never find any true and solid protection or shelter but in and from God, after sound conversion to him. "I am like a green fir tree." The fir tree, Pliny saith, casts not its leaves, and so yields a perpetual shade both in winter and in summer: thus sound conversion yields comfort in all conditions of life. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea," Psal. xli. 1, 2; Hab. iii. 16—18. However it be, God is good to Israel, and it shall go well with the righteous; he will be for a sanctuary to his people, that they need not be afraid, Isa. viii. 12—14. If you would have your hearts raised above all the troubles of the world, get under this fir tree, cast yourselves under this protection, get into the chamber of God's providence and promises, and then, though the troubles of the world may strip you of all outward comforts, yet God will be all to you.

Obs. 8. Though good works be ours when they are done by us, yet they come from God, who enables us to do them; we bear them, but God works and produces them in us; the duty is ours, but the efficacy and blessing is his: "From me is thy fruit found." This falls in with what has been treated of before, and therefore I shall not now enlarge upon it.

Ver. 9. Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them? for the ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them: but the transgressors shall fall therein.

These words are a most pathetic close, and, as it were, a seal which the prophet sets to all the doctrine of his whole book, and the entire course of his ministry; implying, in their general sense, first, A strong asseveration of the truth of all those things which he had in the name of God delivered to them. Secondly, An elegant and forcible excitation of the people to a sad and serious pondering of them, laying to heart the sins therein charged, the duties therein required, the judgments therein threatened, the blessings therein promised. And thirdly, A tacit complaint of the paucity of those who were "wise unto salvation," and of the desperate use which wicked men make of the word of God, and the ministry of his grace; namely, to stumble at it, and to turn it into an occasion of ruin to themselves.

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them?" The interrogation here implies, 1. A secret exprobration of folly to his hearers, or the greater part of them; for so this kind of interrogation frequently in Scripture intimates either a negation, or at least the rareness and difficulty of the thing spoken of; as, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him?" 1 Cor. ii. 16. "Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?" Rom. viii. 33: these are negatives. "Who knoweth the power of thine anger?" Psal. xc. 11. "Who among you will give ear to this?" Isa. xlii. 23. "Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" Isa. liii. 1: these are restrictives.

Who? that is, few or none are such. 2. An earnest wish and desire of the prophet. Oh that men were wise to understand these things, and lay them to heart! as, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" that is, Oh that I were delivered, Rom. vii. 24. "Who will show us any good?" that is, Oh that any could do it, Psal. iv. 6. 3. A strong affirmation or demonstration wherein true wisdom does indeed consist; and what men that are truly wise will do, when the ways of God are by the ministry of his servants set forth before them; namely, ponder and consider their great and weighty import: as Jer. ix. 12, 13, "Who is the wise man, that may understand this?" namely, as it follows, "for what the land perisheth, and is burned up like a wilderness, that none passeth through? And the Lord saith, Because they have forsaken my law which I set before them." This is the character of a wise man, to trace to their proper origin the judgments that are upon a people, and not to allege non causam pro causa, a false cause. 4. A vehement awakening and quickening of the people to this duty of sad attendance on the words which he had spoken to them: as Exod. xxxii. 26, "Who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me." And 2 Kings ix. 32, "Who is on my side? who?" So it is as if the prophet should have said, There are none of you who have been my hearers, but would willingly retain the reputation of men of wisdom and understanding, and would esteem it a high indignity to be handed down to all ages as fools and mad-men. Well, I have preached amongst you many years together, (sixty are the fewest that we can well compute, some say seventy, others, above eighty,) but, alas, what entertainment has mine embassy received? what operation or success has it had amongst you? are not the calves still standing at Dan and Beth-el? do not carnal policies prevail still against the express will of God? O, if there be any wise, any prudent men amongst you, (and oh that all God's people were such!) let them, now at length in the close of my ministry, show their wisdom, by giving heed to what I have declared from the Lord, that they may learn to walk in God's righteous ways, and may not stumble and perish, and "fall therein."

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them?" Two words are here used to express the wisdom which God requires in those who would fruitfully hear his word: * the one importing a mental knowledge of the things, and the other a practical and prudential judgment in pondering them, and in discerning their great and momentous importance to our eternal weal or woe. So the apostle prays for the Colossians, that they might be filled with the knowledge of God's will "in all wisdom and spiritual understanding," Col. i. 9. In mere notional things, which are only to be known for themselves, and are not further reducible to use and practice, the bare knowledge of them is sufficient. But in things the knowledge whereof is ever in order to a further end, there is required, besides the knowledge itself, † a faculty of wisdom and judgment to apply and manage that knowledge to, and for the advancement of, that end. Now, we know that theological learning is all of it practical, and has an intrinsic respect and a direct tendency to enforce worship and obedience: † therefore it is called "the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness," Tit. i. 1. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments," Psal. cxi. 10. "Keep therefore" his judgments "and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding," Deut. iv. 6. Therefore, besides the bare knowledge of truth, there is required wisdom and spiritual understanding, to direct that knowledge to those holy uses and saving ends for which it was intended.

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them?" The doubling of the interrogation thus, augments the force of the words, and denotes that it is the supreme and most excellent act of wisdom and prudence, so to know the word and ways of God, as with a practical judgment to ponder them in order to salvation.

"For the ways of the Lord are right." We are to understand hereby, 1. The ways of his judgments, and of his wonderful providence toward men: which, however, to the proud and contentious spirit of the wicked, they may seem perverse and inordinate, and to the eye of all men "unsearchable;" ‡ are yet by spiritual wisdom acknowledged to be most righteous and holy, to have no crookedness or disorder in them, but to be carried on in an even and straight course to the ends whereunto his holy counsel directs them. "His work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment," Deut. xxxii. 4. When Jeremiah desired to plead with the Lord concerning his judgments, he yet premises this as a matter unquestionable, that God was righteous in them all, Jer. xii. 1.

2. The ways of his will, word, and worship. So the word is often taken in Scripture, to signify the doctrine which men teach, as Matt. xxiii. 16; Acts xiii. 10; xviii. 25; xxii. 4; and damnable heresies are called "pernicious ways," in opposition to "the way of truth," 2 Pet. ii. 2; and the rites or rules of corrupt worship are called by the prophet "The manner of Beersheba," Amos viii. 14. These ways of God are likewise very straight, carrying men on in a "right" line to a happy end, Psal. xix. 8; whereas wicked ways have crookedness and perverseness in them, Psal. cxv. 5: and this seems here chiefly to be meant, because there follows, "the just shall walk in them;" that is, they shall so ponder and judge of the righteous ways of God in his word, as to make choice of them for the way wherein they intend to walk, as the psalmist speaks, "I have chosen the way of truth," Psal. cxix. 30: whereas wicked men being offended at the purity of Di-Chald. Targum.

The words thus opened, lead us to dwell especially on the powerful and pathetic call contained in them to the people of Israel, to consider maturely and obey implicitly the doctrines taught by the prophet throughout his whole ministration amongst them. The arguments which he uses are drawn from,

I. The character of the persons: "Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them?"

II. The nature of the doctrines taught: "For the ways of the Lord are right."

III. The twofold use made thereof by different kinds of men. 1. To the just, the Lord's ways are a way of happiness; "The just shall walk in them." 2. To the wicked, an occasion of stumbling; "The transgressors shall fall therein."

I. The character of the persons. And here two things present themselves: 1. The one intimated, their paucity. 2. The other expressed, their prudence.

* Dux sunt partes rationis secundum philosophum, una intellectualis, altera loquax, que ratiocinatur et deliberatur in ordine ad mores. Vide Arist. Ethic. lib. 6. cap. 8.

† Ὁὐ πῶς εἶδέναι μόνον φρόνους ἀλλὰ καὶ πῶς πράττειν. Arist. Ethic. l. 7. cap. 11.

‡ Οἱ δ' ἐν μὴ ἐπισκοπῶντι βιοῦντες ὡς εἶδασθε, γινώσκοντες θεῶν μὴ ὄντες Χριστιανοί, κἀν λόγῳ διὰ γλώττης τοῦ Χριστοῦ διδάγματα. Justin Martyr. Apol. 2. Qui Christiani numinis opus non agunt, Christianus non esse videntur. Salvia. de Govern. Dei. lib. 4.

§ Judicia Dei plerunque occulta, nunquam iniusta. Aug. Serm. 88. de Tempore. Ἀγαθὴ ἡ πῶς Θεοῦ δικαιοσύνη. Clem. Alex. Vid. Tertul. contra Marcion. lib. 2. cap. 11—16.

1. The paucity of the persons. This is intimated, as we have seen, by the interrogative form of the words, and leads us to

Obs. 1. There are few who are "wise unto salvation," few who seriously attend to and manage the ministry of the word to that end. If there be any accidental lenocinium to allure the fancies, or excite the curiosity or customary attendance of men on the ordinances, elegance in the speaker, novelty and quaintness in the matter, credit or advantage in the duty, on such inducements many will wait on the word; some to hear "a very lovely song," Ezek. xxxiii. 32, others to hear some "new doctrine," Acts xvii. 19; some for the loaves, to promote their secular advantages, John vi. 26, having one and the selfsame reason for following Christ which the Gadarenes had when they entreated him to depart from their coasts. But very few there are who do it propter se, and with respect to the primary use and intention of it. Our prophet seems to do as the philosopher, who lighted a candle at noon to find out a man wise indeed; he seems to "run to and fro through the streets," and to "seek in the broad places thereof, if" he "can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, that seeketh the truth," as the Lord commanded the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. v. 1. How does the most elegant of all the prophets complain, "Who hath believed our report?" Isa. lii. 1: xlix. 4. How does the most learned of the apostles complain, that the preaching of the gospel was esteemed "foolishness!" 1 Cor. i. 23. Noah was a preacher of righteousness to a whole world of men, and yet but "eight" persons were saved from the flood, and some of them rather for their family's sake than their own, 1 Pet. iii. 20. Paul preached to a whole academy at Athens, and yet but very few were converted, Acts xvii. 34; some disputed, and others mocked, but few believed the things which they were not able to gainsay. Hezekiah sent messengers into all Israel to invite them to the true worship of God at Jerusalem, but they were "laughed" "to scorn, and mocked," and a remnant only "humbled themselves, and came to Jerusalem." 2 Chron. xxx. 10, 11; Isa. xvii. 6; xxiv. 13. Though a gun be discharged at a whole flight of birds, but few are killed. Though the net be spread over the whole pond, but a few fishes are taken; many thrust their heads into the mud and the net passes over them: and so most hearers busy their heads with their own sensual or worldly thoughts, and so escape the power of the word. Out of the richest mine there is much more earth and dross dug than pure metal. Christ's flock in every place is but "a little flock." Luke xii. 32; "few chosen," Matt. xx. 16; "few saved," Luke xiii. 25; "few there be that find" the "narrow way which leadeth unto life," Matt. vii. 13, 14. The basest creatures are usually the most numerous, as flies and vermin; those that are more noble are likewise more rare. "The people of the God of Abraham" are, in the Scripture style, "princes" and "noble," Psal. xlvii. 9; Acts xvii. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 9; and how few are there of such in comparison of the vulgar sort! They are indeed many in themselves, Heb. i. 10; Rev. vii. 9, but very few, and widely scattered, when compared with the rest of the world.

Rari sunt qui philosophantur, Pl. plan. P. de Exacu. Leg. 5. Rari quippe boni, numero vi sunt fideles qui Theaurum portat vel divitie ostia Nis. Juvenal. Sat. 13.

We must therefore learn not to be offended or discouraged by the paucity of sincere professors, nor more * Pudet doctos homines ex discipulis Platonis fieri discipulos Christi, &c. Vid. Aug. de Civit. Dei, l. 10. c. 29. et l. 13. c. 16. et Ep. 102.

† Ὑπακούοντες εὐαγγελίου παρακούσαι κριτήριον. Clem. Alex. in Protrept.
‡ Vultures unguento fugantur et scarabei rosa. Plin. et than we are in a civil state by the comparative paucity of wise counsellors and politicians. It is no strange thing at all in any community to see the weaker part more numerous than the wiser. If but few attend the "right ways of the Lord," and "walk in them," remember it is a work of wisdom, and such wisdom as cometh from above, and has no seeds or principles in corrupt nature out of which it might be drawn; nay, against which all the vigour of carnal reason exalts itself; so that the more natural wisdom men have, the more in danger they are to despise and undervalue the ways of God, as being better able to reason and to cavil against them,* Matt. xi. 25; Acts iv. 11; John vii. 48; 1 Cor. i. 20, 28; ii. 8; 2 Cor. x. 5, 6. Therefore, 1. In the ministry of the word we must continue our labour, "though Israel be not gathered," Isa. xlix. 4, 5. We must stretch out our hands, though it be to "a disobedient and gainsaying people," Rom. x. 21; Isa. lxxv. 2. "Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear," we must speak to them, be they never so rebellious, Ezek. ii. 7. And the reason is, because the word is never in vain, but it doth ever "prosper in the thing whereto" God sends "it," Isa. lv. 11. If men be righteous, they "walk;" if wicked, they "stumble;"† and in both there is "unto God a sweet savour," 2 Cor. ii. 15. God's work is accomplished, his glory promoted, the power of his gospel commended, in the one and in the other; as the virtue of a sweet savour is seen as well by the antipathy which one creature has to it, as by the refreshment which another receives from it;‡ the strength of a rock, as by yielding firm support to the house that is built upon it, so by breaking in pieces the ship which dashes against it; the force of the fire, as well by consuming the dross as by refining the gold; the power of the water, as well in sinking the leaky as in supporting the sound ship. The pillar of the cloud was as wonderful in the darkness which it cast on the Egyptians, as in the light which it gave to the Israelites, Exod. xiv. 20; the power of the angel as great in striking terror into the soldiers, as in speaking comfort to the women, Matt. xxviii. 4, 5. 2. In attendance on the word, we must resolve rather to walk with the wise, though few, than to follow a multitude to do evil, and to stumble with the wicked, though they be many; rather enter the ark with a few, than venture the flood with a world of sinners; rather go three or four out of Sodom, than be burnt for company. We must not affect a capricious or fastidious singularity in differing unnecessarily from good men, being one for Paul against Apollon, another for Apollon against Cephas; but we must ever affect a holy and pious singularity in walking contrary to evil men, in shining "as lights" "in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation," Phil. ii. 15; for "the righteous is more excellent than his neighbour," Prov. xii. 26. Though there be but few in the way, there will be many in the end of the journey. As the tribes and families went up divided toward Jerusalem, but when come thither, "every one of them in Zion appeareth before God," Psal. lxxxiv. 7.

2. The prudence of the persons: and in that the prophet calls upon his hearers to attend to his doctrine by this argument, that it will be an evidence of their prudence and wisdom, we are led to

Obs. 2. True wisdom draws the heart to know aright, that is, to consider and ponder the judgments, blessings, ways, and word of God in order to the chief ends, and according thereto to direct all the conversation:

Ælian. Καθαίρουσ ῥόδιον χρισθέντας μύρον τελευτῶν λίγωνισ. Clem. Pædag. 1. 2. c. 8. Ὁ γὰρ Στώικός ἔρος, ὡσπερ οἱ κἀνθαροὶ λίγονται πὸ μὴ μύρον ἀπολεπίειν, τὰ δὲ ἐσαοπίθ διδικειν. Plutarch. Nissen. Hom. 3. in Cantic. Τὸν αἰλουρον ὄσμιν μύρον ἐκπαρτεθεῖται καὶ μαίνεσθαι λίγωνισ. Plutarch. in Conjugaliib. Præcept.

"Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them?" In God's account, that knowledge which edifies not, is no knowledge at all, 1 Cor. viii. 2. None are his wise men who are not "wise unto salvation," 2 Tim. iii. 15; who do not draw their wisdom from his word, and from his commandments, Psal. xix. 7; cxix. 98, 99; Jer. viii. 9.

There is a twofold wisdom, according to the distinction of the philosopher, σοφία κατὰ μέρος and σοφία ὅλως. The former signifies wisdom in some particulars: * thus we esteem every man who is excellent in his profession, a wise man, so far as concerns the managing of that profession; we account him such when he knows all the necessary principles and maxims of his business, the right ends thereof, and the proper conclusions deducible from those principles, and derigible to those ends. As to the latter, σοφία ὅλως, wisdom in general, and in perfection, it regards those principles, ends, and conclusions, which are universally and most transcendently necessary to a man's chiefest and most general good: and this the philosopher calls the knowledge of the most excellent and honourable things, or of the last end and chief good of man. Now the end, by how much the more supreme, perpetual, and ultimate it is, so much the more it has of excellency and goodness in it, as bearing thereby most exact proportion and adaptation to the soul of man; for the soul being immortal itself, can have no final satisfaction from any good which is mortal and perishable: and being withal so large and unlimited, as that its reasonings and desires extend to the whole latitude of goodness, being not restrained to this or that kind, but capable of desiring and judging of all the different degrees of goodness which are in all the whole variety of things, it can therefore never finally acquiesce in any but the most universal and comprehensive goodness, in the nearer or more remote participation whereof consists the different goodness of all other things.

This supreme and absolute goodness can indeed be but one, all other things being good by participation with that. "There is none good but one, that is, God," Matt. xix. 17. But because there are two sorts of men in the world, righteous and wicked, the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent; therefore, consequently, there are two sorts of ends which these men do differently pursue. The end of wicked men is a happiness which they, out of their own corrupt judgments, shape to themselves, and to which they finally carry all the motions of their souls, called in Scripture "the pleasures of sin," and "the wages of unrighteousness," Heb. xi. 25; 2 Pet. ii. 15; that thing, whatsoever it is, to obtain which men direct all their other endeavours, as profit, pleasure, honour, or power. And there are mediums exactly proportionable to these ends; namely, "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," 1 John ii. 16. And there is a wisdom consonant to these means, and fit to direct and manage these lusts to the attaining of those ends; which therefore the apostle calls τὸ φρόνημα τῆς σαρκός, the wisdom of the flesh or corrupt nature, Rom. viii. 7; and St. James, a wisdom "earthly, sensual, devilish," James iii. 15: "earthly," managing "the lust of the eyes" to the ends of gain; "sensual," managing "the lust of the flesh" to the ends of pleasure; and "devilish," managing "the pride of life" to the ends of power. But such wisdom as this God esteems very foolishness: "My people is foolish; " "they are sottish children, and they have none understanding." Why? "They are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge," Jer. iv. 22. Wisdom is only to that which is good; he is the wisest man who is simple and ignorant in the trade of evil, Rom. xvi. 19. "If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise," 1 Cor. iii. 18.

* Μάγειρος ἔστιν οὐκ ἰδὼν ζωήθησιν ἔχων τις ἰατρὴ καὶ μάχαιραν πρὸς τινὰ· οὐδ' ἂν τις εἰς τὰς λοπάδας ἰχθύος ἐμβύ-

On the other side, the true and ultimate end of righteous men, is Almighty God, as most glorious in himself, and most good to us; or the seeking of his glory, that he may be honoured by us; and of our own salvation, that we may be glorified by him. The fruition of him as the highest and first in genere veri, and the greatest and last in genere boni, the chiefest object for the mind to rest in by knowledge, and the heart by love; this must needs be the best of all ends, both in regard of its excellency, as being infinitely and most absolutely good; and in regard of its eternity, so that the soul having once possession of it, can never want that happiness which flows from it, John vi. 27. The proper means for the obtaining of this end, is the knowledge of God in Christ, as in his word he has revealed himself, to be known, worshipped, and obeyed; for there only does he teach us the way to himself: and true wisdom is the pursuing of this means in order to that end. For though many approaches may be made toward God by the search and contemplation of the creature, yet in his word he has shown us "a more" full and "excellent way," which only can make us "wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus," 2 Tim. iii. 15; Prov. ix. 10; Eccl. xii. 12, 13; Jer. ix. 23, 24.

All the thoughts and wisdom of men are spent on one of these two heads, either the obtaining of the good which we want, or the avoiding and declining the evil which we fear. And by how much the more excellent and difficult the good is which we want, and by how much the more pernicious and imminent the evil which we fear, by so much greater is the wisdom which in both these procures the end at which we aim. Now, then, what are the most excellent good things which we want? Food is common to us with other creatures; raiment, houses, lands, possessions, common to us with the worst of men: take the most admired perfections which are not heavenly, and we may find very wicked men excel in them. All men will confess the soul to be more excellent than the body; and therefore the good of the former to be more excellent than that of the latter; and its chief good to be that which most advances it toward the Fountain of goodness, where is fulness of perfection, and perpetuity of fruition. The excellency of every thing consists in two things; the perfection of beauty wherein it was made, and the perfection of use for which it was made. The beauty of man, especially in his soul, consists in this, that he was made like to God, after his image, Gen. i. 26, 27; and his end and use in this, that he was made for God, first to serve him, and after to enjoy him: for "the Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself," Psal. iv. 3. "This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise," Isa. xliii. 21. Therefore to recover the image of God, which is in "knowledge," "righteousness, and true holiness," Col. iii. 10; Eph. iv. 24; to work to the service and glory of God, John xv. 8; to aspire to and enjoy the possession and fruition of God, Exod. xxxiii. 18; Phil. i. 23; must needs be man's greatest good; and, consequently, to attend on the means thereof must needs be his greatest wisdom.

What is the most pernicious and destructive evil which a man is in danger of? Not the loss of any outλη. Ἄλλ' ἔστι τις φρόνησις ἐν τῷ πράγματι. Philemon apud Athenæum, lib. 7. cap. 11. et Liv. 46. 39.

Fecisti nos ad te, et inquietum est cor nostrum donec requiescat in te. Aug. Confess. l. 1. c. 1. Omnis mihi copia, que lives mensura est, egrestia est. Lib. 12. cap. 8. Vid. de Trinit. lib. 8. c. 2. de Civit. Dei, l. 12. c. 1.

Beatitudo hinc duo requirit, fruitionem incommunicabilem boni, et certitudinem eterne fructificationis. Vid. Aug. de Civ. Dei, lib. 11. cap. 13.

Vid. Aristot. de iis que bona sunt, et que meliora et majora. Rhetor. lib. 1. cap. 6. 7.

ward good things whatsoever, for they are all in their nature perishable; we enjoy them on the very condition of parting with them again; no wisdom can keep them: "Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats; but God shall destroy both it and them," 1 Cor. vi. 13. Not the suffering of any outward troubles, which the best of men have suffered and triumphed over. But the greatest loss is the loss of a precious soul, which is more worth than all the world, Matt. xvi. 26; and the greatest suffering is the wrath of God on the conscience, Psal. xc. 11; Isa. xxxiii. 14; Heb. x. 31; Matt. x. 28. Therefore, to avoid this danger, and to snatch this "darling from the paw of the lion," is of all other the greatest wisdom. It is wisdom to deliver a "city," Eccl. ix. 15; much more to deliver "souls," Prov. xi. 30. Angelical, seraphical knowledge, without this, is all worth "nothing," 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2.

Therefore we should learn to show ourselves wise indeed, by attendance on God's word. If the most glorious creatures for wisdom and knowledge that ever

God made, the blessed angels, were employed in publishing the law of God, Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19, and did with great admiration "look into" the mysteries of the gospel, and stoop down with their faces towards the mercy-seat, 1 Pet. i. 12; Eph. iii. 10; Exod. xxxvii.

9; it cannot but be also our chiefest wisdom to hide the word in our hearts, and to make it our companion and "counsellor," Psal. cxix. 24. We esteem him the wisest man who follows the best and safest counsel, and that which will most preserve and promote his interest, his honour, and his conscience. Herein was Rehoboam's weakness, that by rash and passionate counsels he suffered his honour to be stained, his interest to be weakened, and his conscience to be defiled with resolutions of violence and injustice. Now there is no counsel to be compared with that of God's word. It enlightens the eyes, it "maketh wise the simple," Psal. cxix. 7, 8.

It is able to make a man "wise" for himself, and "unto salvation," which no other counsel can do, 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16. No case can be put, though of never so great intricacy and perplexity, no doubt so difficult, no temptation so knotty and involved, no condition whereinto a man can be brought so desperate, no employment so dark and uncouth, no service so arduous or full of discouragements, in all which, so far as respects conscience and salvation, there are not most clear and satisfactory expedients to be drawn out of God's word, if a man have his judgment and senses after a spiritual manner exercised therein. That we are so often at a stand how to state such a question, how to satisfy such a scruple, how to clear and expedite such a difficulty, how to repel such a temptation, how to manage such an action, how to order our ways with an even and composed spirit in the various conditions whereinto we are cast in this world, arises not from any defect in the word of God, which is "perfect," and able to furnish us "unto every good work," but only from our own ignorance and imperfect acquaintance with it, who know not how to draw the general rule, and to apply it to our own particular cases. And this cannot but be matter of great humiliation to us in these sad and distracted times, when, besides our civil breaches, which threaten desolation to the state, there are so many and such wide divisions in the church; that, after so long enjoyment of the word of God, the Scripture should be to so many men as a sealed book, and they, like the Egyptians, have the dark side of this glorious pillar towards them still; that men should be "tossed to and fro" like children, "and carried about with every wind of doctrine," and suffer themselves to be bewitched, devoured, brought into bondage, spoiled, led away captive, unskilful in the word of righteousness, unable to discern good and evil, to prove and "try the spirits whether they are of God," always learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth; and this not only in matters problematical, or circumstantial, wherein learned and godly men may differ from one another, and yet still the peace and unity of the church be preserved, (for things of this nature ought not to be occasions of schism, or secessions from one another,) but in matters which concern life and godliness, touching the power of God's law, the nature of free grace, the subjection of the conscience to moral precepts, confession and deprecation of sin in prayer to God; the distinguishing true Christian liberty from loose, profane, and wanton licentiousness, and a liberty to vent and publish what perverse things soever men please; the very being of churches, of ministers, of ordinances, in the world; the necessity of humiliation and solemn repentance in times of public judgments; the toleration of all kinds of religions in Christian commonwealths; the mortality of the reasonable soul, and other the like pernicious and perverse doctrines of men of corrupt minds, (the devil's emissaries,) purposely by him stirred up to hinder and puzzle the reformation of the church. These things, I say, cannot but be matter of humiliation to all that fear God, and love the prosperity of Zion; and occasions the more earnestly to excite them to this wisdom in the text, to hear what God the Lord says, and to lay his righteous ways so to heart, as to walk steadfastly in them, and never to stumble at them, or fall from them.

Now there are two things which the prophet, in this close of his prophecy, seems to intimate should chiefly engage the attention and animate the obedience of the wise and prudent in times of trouble; namely, 1. The judgments, and, 2. The blessings, of God; his righteous ways in his threatenings against impenitent, and in his promises made to penitent, sinners. These are the things which wise and prudent men will consider in times of trouble.

1. The judgments of God. There is a twofold knowledge of them; the one natural, by sense; the other spiritual, by faith. In the former way wicked men do abundantly know the afflictions which they suffer, even to vexation and anguish of spirit. They "fret themselves," Isa. viii. 21; "gray hairs are here and there upon" them from very trouble and sorrow, Hos. vii. 9; they gnaw "their tongues for pain," Rev. xvi. 10; "they pine away in their iniquities," Lev. xxvi. 39; they are "mad" in their calamities, have "a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind," Deut. xxviii. 34, 35. In the latter, or spiritual sense, wicked men discern not, so they are said in the Scripture, when they burn, when they consume, when they are devoured, not to know any of this, neither to lay it to heart, Isa. xlii. 25; Hos. vii. 9; Jer. xii. 11; and the reason is, because they know it not by faith, nor in a spiritual manner, leading them to God. They see not his name, nor bear his rod, nor consider his hand and counsel, in it; nor measure his judgments by his word, nor look on them as the fruits of sin, leading to repentance and teaching righteousness; nor as the arguments of God's displeasure, humbling us under his holy hand, and guiding us to seek his face, and to recover our peace with him. This is the spiritual and prudent way of knowing judgments, Micah vi. 9; Isa. xxvi. 8, 9; xxvii. 9; Lev. xxvi. 40-42. Scire est per causam scire. True wisdom looks on things in their causes; resolves judgments into their causes; our sins to be bewailed, God's wrath to be averted; it makes this observation upon them: Now I find by experience, that God is a God of truth; often have I heard judgments threatened against sin, and now I see that God's

Sunt quardam falsæ opinionæ quæ uicis non pugnant: sunt etiam errores ueniales, qui animam depaſuntur. Vid. Plutarch. de Superstiti.

Μαῦ ῥοφάνη ὅτι οὐκ αὐτὸ σοφία, Πύλαρ, de occulis titendo.

threatenings are not empty wind, but that all his words have truth and substance in them. The first part of wisdom is, to see judgments in the word before they come, and to hide from them; for as faith, in regard of promises, is "the substance of things hoped for," and can discern a being in them while they are yet but to come; so, in respect of threatenings, it is the substance of things feared, and can see a being in judgments before they are felt. The next part of wisdom is, to see God in judgments, in the rods when they are actually come, and to know them as leading to him. And that knowledge consists in two things: first, to resolve them into him as their author; for nothing can hurt us without a commission from God, Job xix. 11. Satan spoils Job of his children, the Sabeans and Chaldeans strip him of his goods; but he looks above all these to God, acknowledging his goodness in giving, his power in taking away, and blesses his name, Job i. 21. Joseph looks from the malice of his brethren to the providence of God; "God did send me before you to preserve life," Gen. xlv. 5. If the whale swallow Jonah, God prepares him, Jonah i. 17; and if he vomit him up again, God speaks unto him, chap. ii. 10. Secondly, to direct them to him as the end; and to be taught by them to seek the Lord, and to wait on him in the way of his judgments; to be more penitent for sin, more fearful and watchful against it; to study and practise the skill of suffering as Christians, according to the will of God, that he may be glorified, Psal. xciv. 12; cxix. 67, 71; Deut. viii. 16; Zech. xiii. 9; Isa. xxvi. 9; Heb. xii. 11; 1 Pet. iv. 16, 19.

Perdidistis utilitatem calamitatis et miseriam facti estis, et pessimi permansistis. Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 1. c. 13.

2. The blessings of God. There is a double knowledge of them; one sensual by the flesh, the other spiritual in the conscience. The former is but a brutish and epicurean feeding on them without fear, as Israel on the quails in the wilderness; as swine, which feed on the fruit that falls down, but never look up to the tree whereon it grew; to use blessings as Adam did the forbidden fruit, being drawn by the beauty of them to forget God, Hos. xiii. 6. But spiritual knowledge of blessings, is to taste and see the goodness of the Lord in them; to look up to him as their author, acknowledging that it is he who "giveth" us "power to get wealth," and every other good thing, Deut. viii. 17, 18; Psal. cxxvii. 1; Prov. x. 22; and to be drawn by them unto him as their end, to the adoration of his bounty, to the admiration of his goodness, to more cheerfulness and stronger engagements to his service; to say with Jacob, He gives me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, therefore he shall be my God, Gen. xxviii. 20, 21. He "giveth" me "richly all things to enjoy," therefore I will "trust in" him, 1 Tim. vi. 17. Catalogues of mercy should beget resolutions of obedience, Josh. xxiv. 2—14.

II. The nature of the doctrines taught. "For the ways of the Lord are right." This integrity the prophet urges as a motive to induce us to consider them the more maturely, and obey them the more implicitly. Now the doctrine of God's judgments, precepts, and promises, is said to be right divers ways.

1. In regard of their equity and reasonableness. There is nothing more profoundly and exactly rational than true religion; and therefore conversion is called by our Saviour conviction.* "And when he," the Spirit of truth, "is come," ἰδέγεται, "he will convince the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment," John xvi. 8. There is a power in the word of God to stop the mouths and dispel the evils of all contradicters; so that they shall "not" be "able to resist," or speak against, the truth that is taught, John xvi. 8; Tit. i. 9, 10; Acts vi. 10; Matt. xxii. 34. And the apostle calls his ministry, a declaration and a manifestation of the truth of God to the consciences of men, 1 Cor. ii. 4; 2 Cor. iv. 2. And Apollos is said mightily to have "convinced the Jews," "showing" or demonstrating "by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ," Acts xviii. 28. Therefore the apostle calls the devoting of ourselves to God, our "reasonable service," Rom. xii. 1; and those that obey not the word, are called "unreasonable" or absurd men, that have not wisdom to discern the truth and equity of the ways of God, 2 Thess. iii. 2. What can be more reasonable than that he who made all things for himself should be served by the creatures which he made? that we should live to him who gave us our being? that the supreme will should be obeyed, the infallible truth believed? that he who can destroy should be feared? that he who rewards should be loved and trusted in? that absolute justice should vindicate itself against presumptuous disobedience, and absolute goodness extend mercy to whom it pleases? It is no marvel that the Holy Spirit brands wicked men throughout the Scripture with the disgraceful title of fools, because they reject that which is the supreme rule of wisdom, and has in it the greatest perfection and exactness of reason, Jer. viii. 9.

Demonstratio est syllogismus scientificus. Arist. proter. Analyt. lib. 1. c. 2.

Nullum scelus rationem habet. Liv. lib. 28.

2. In regard of their mutual agreement and harmony.† As that which is right and straight has all its parts equal and agreeing one to another, so all the parts of Divine doctrine are exactly suitable and conformed to each other. The promises of God are not yea and nay, but yea and Amen, 2 Cor. i. 19, 20. However there may be seeming repugnances to a carnal and captious eye, (which may seem designedly allowed for the exercise of our diligence in searching, and humility in adoring, the profoundness and perfection of the word,) yet the Scriptures have no obliquity in them at all, but all the parts thereof do most intimately agree one with another, as being written by the Spirit of truth who cannot lie nor deceive, who is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever."

3. In regard of their directness to that end for which they were revealed to men, being the strait road to eternal life, "able to build" us "up, and to give" us "an inheritance," Acts xx. 32. In which respect the word is called "the word of this life," Acts v. 20, and "the gospel of" "salvation," Eph. i. 13; yea, salvation itself, John iv. 22; xii. 50; Acts xxviii. 28, as being the way to it, and the instrument of it, 2 Tim. iii. 15—17; James i. 21.

4. In regard of their conformity to the holy nature and will of God, which is the original rule † of all rectitude and perfection. Law is nothing but the will of the lawgiver, revealed with an intention to bind those that are under it, and for the ordering of whom it was revealed. That will being in God most holy and perfect, the law or word, which is but the discovery of it, must needs be holy and perfect too; therefore it is called the "acceptable and perfect will of God," Rom. xii. 2; Col. i. 9. It is also called a "word of truth," importing a conformity between the mind and will of the speaker and the word which is spoken by him; in which respect it is said to be "holy, and just, and good," Rom. vii. 12.

sacro codice affirmatur, contrarium aliquid in hoc codice positum, nullum sibi locum vindicabit, &c. Cod. de vetere Jure euclaudendo, l. 2. sect. 15. et l. 3. sect. 15.

† Non idcirco juste voluit quia futurum justum fuit quod voluit: sed quod voluit, idcirco justum fuit quia ipse voluit, &c. Hug. de Sacrament. lib. 1. part. 4. cap. 1.

* Elenchus est syllogismus cum contradictione conclusionis. Arist. Elench. l. 8. c. 1. Et ἰδέγεται est certa argumentatione disputantem vincere. Steph. ex Platone.

† Ὁδοῦναι γραμῆν τῆ ἱστῆρα ἰναυτῆ ἰσῆν, αὐτοῦ μὴ ποῖν μᾶλλον ὁμολογῆσθαι τὰ εἰρημῆνα. &c. Just. Mart. Dialog. cum Tryphon. Quod de suo codice Justinianus, verius de

5. In regard of their plainness and perspicuity. They are doctrines in which men may walk surely, easily, without danger of wandering, stumbling, or miscarriage; as a man is out of danger of missing a way, if it be straight and direct, without any turnings, and in no great danger of falling in it, if it be plain and smooth, and no stumbling-block left in it. Now such is the word of God to those who make it their way: a "straight" way, which looks directly forward, Psal. v. 8; Heb. xii. 13. An "even" and smooth way, which has no offence or stumbling-block in it, Psal. xxvi. 12; cxix. 165. True, there are δυσνόητα, hard things, to exercise the study and diligence, the faith and prayers, of the profoundest scholars; water wherein an elephant may swim. But yet, as nature has made things of greatest necessity to be most obvious and common, as air, water, bread, and the like; whereas things of greater rarity, as gems and jewels, are matters of honour and ornament, not of daily use: so the wisdom of God has so tempered the Scriptures, that from thence the wisest Solomon may fetch jewels for ornament, and the poorest Lazarus bread for life; but those things which are of common necessity, as matters of faith, love, worship, obedience, which are universally requisite to "the common salvation," (as the apostle expresses it, Jude 3; Tit. i. 4.) are so perspicuously set down in the Holy Scriptures, that every one who has the Spirit of Christ, has therewithal a judgment to discern so much of God's will as shall suffice to make him believe in Christ for righteousness, and by worship and obedience serve him unto salvation.* The way of holiness is so plain that simple men are made wise enough to find it out, and "the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein," Psal. xix. 7; Isa. xxxii. 4; xxxv. 8; Matt. xi. 25. From all which

Obs. 3. We should take heed of quarrelling with any word of God, or presuming to pass any bold and carnal censure of ours on his righteous ways. When God sets his word energetically in its power on the spirit of any wicked man, making his conscience to hear it as the voice of God, it usually works one of these two effects: either it subdues the soul to obedience by convincing, judging, and manifesting the secrets of his heart, so that he falleth down on his face and worshippeth God, 1 Cor. xiv. 25; or else it does by accident excite and enrage the natural love which is in every man to his lusts, stirring up all the proud arts and reasonings which the forge of a corrupt heart can shape in defence of those lusts against the sword of the Spirit which would cut them off, as that which hinders the course of a river, accidentally enrages its force, and causes it to swell and overrun the banks. And from hence arise gainsaying and contradiction against the word of grace, and the ways of God, as unequal and unreasonable, too strict, too severe, too hard to be observed, Ezek. xviii. 25; snuffing at it, Mal. i. 13, gathering odious consequences from it, Rom. iii. 8, replying against it, Rom. ix. 19, 20, casting reproaches on it, Jer. xx. 8, 9, enviously swelling at it, Acts xiii. 45. There are few sins more dangerous than this of picking quarrels at God's word, and taking up weapons against it. It will prove "a burdensome stone for" "all that burden themselves with it," Zech. xii. 3; Matt. xxi. 44. Therefore whenever our crooked and corrupt reason offers to except against the ways of God as unequal, we must presently conclude as God does, Ezek. xviii. 25, that the inequality is in us, and not in them.† When a lame man stumbles in a plain path, the fault is not in the way, but in the foot. Nor is the potion, but the palate, to blame, when a feverish distemper makes that seem bitter which is indeed sweet. He that removes in a boat from the shore, in the judgment of sense sees the houses or trees on the shore totter and move, whereas the motion is in the boat, and not in them. Unclean and corrupt hearts have unclean notions of the purest things, and conceive of God as if he were altogether such a one as themselves, Psal. l. 21.

Obs. 4. We should come to God's word always as to a rule by which we are to measure ourselves, and take heed of wresting it to the corrupt fancies of our own evil hearts, as the apostle saith some men do "unto their own destruction," 2 Pet. iii. 16; Acts xiii. 10. Every wicked man, though not formally and explicitly, yet really and in truth, sets up his own will against God's, resolving to do what pleases himself, and not that which may please God, and consequently follows that reason and counsel which wait upon his own will, and not that word which reveals God's. Yet because he that will serve himself would fain deceive himself too, (that so he may do it with less regret of conscience,) and would fain seem God's servant, but be his own, therefore corrupt reason sets itself on work to excogitate such distinctions and evasions as may serve to reconcile God's word and a man's own lust together.‡ Lust saith, Steal. God saith, No, thou shalt not steal. Carnal reason, the advocate of lust, comes in and makes some evasive distinctions; I may not steal from a neighbour, but I may weaken an enemy, or pay myself the stipend that belongs to my service, if others do not: thus most innocent men may be made a prey to violent soldiers, who use the name of public interest to palliate their own rapacity. Certainly it is a high presumption to tamper with the word of truth, and make it bear false witness in favour of our own sins; and God will bring it to a trial at last whose will shall stand, his or ours.

Obs. 5. "The ways of the Lord" should be the boundary, both to the ministration of the preacher, and to the faith of the hearer. 1. To us in our ministry, that we deliver nothing to the people but the "right" "ways of the Lord," § without any commixtures or contempurations of our own. Mixtures are useful only for either of these two purposes, either to abate something that is excessive, or to supply something that is deficient, and to collect a virtue and efficacy out of many things, each one of which alone * In iis quæ continentur in Scripturis posita sunt inveniuntur illa omnia quæ apte contineat fidem, muresque vivendi. Aug. de Doct. Christian. lib. 2. c. 9. et Ep. 3. ad Volusian. et contr. Ep. Petilian. cap. 5. Vid. Theodoret. serm. 8. de Martyrib. s. 12.

† Ut vernula illa apud Senecam quæ cum cæca esset, cubiculum esse tenebrum querebat. Έν τῷ πυθέτειν πικρά πάντα καὶ ἀγρή φαίνεται γεννημένοι—ἄλλ' οὐδέτι ποτόν ἀλλὰ τὴν νόσον αἰτιώμεθα. Plutarch. de Animi Tranquillitate.

‡ Βιάζονται πρὸς τὰς ἐπιθυμίας τὴν γραφὴν. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. 7. Εἰς τὰς ἰδίας μετὰ τῶν δόξας. Ibid. Κλέπτουσι τῶν κἀνανα πρὸς ἐκκλησίας, ταῖς ἰδίαις ἐπιθυμίαις καὶ φιλοδοξίαις χαρίζονται. Ibid. Έλκοντες πρὸς τὴν ἑαυτῶν ἄρῃν τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, &c. Justin. Martyr. Ep. ad Zenam. Simplicitatem sermonis ecclesiastici id voluit significare quod ipsi sentiant. Hieron. Ep. Vid. Aug. de Doct. Christian. lib.

3. cap. 10. Scripturas tenent ad speciem, non ad salutem. De Baptismo. contr. Donat. lib. 3. cap. ult. Eas secundum solum sensum legunt. De Grat. Christ. lib. 1. c. 41. Sequitur voluptatem non quam audit, sed quam attulit, et vitia sua cuius obsecrare putare sibi præceptis, indulget illis non timide nec coepit; luxuriatur etiam inoperto capite. Sen. de Vita Beata, cap. 13. Nondum hæc negligitæ Deum venerat, nec interpretando sibi quicquid jururandum et leges aptas faciebat, sed suos potius mores ad ea accomodabat. Lib. liv. 3.

§ Aurum accipiat, aurum reddat; nolo mihi pro aliis alia subjecias; nolo pro auro aut impudenter plumbum, aut fraudulenter seramenta suppnas; nolo auri speciem sed naturam plane. Vincent. Lirin. Lege Cornelia utatur qui in aurum vitii quid addiderit, qui argenteos nummos adulterinos flaverit, falsi crimine teneatur. L. 9. P. Leg. Cornel. de Falsis. Qui tabulam legis reherxit vel quid inde immutaverit, Lege Julia peculatus tenetur. L. 8. P. ad Leg. Jul. Peculatus.

Cesset voluntas propria et non erit infernus, &c. Vid. Bernard. serm. 3. de Resurrect.

would have been ineffectual. And so all heterogeneous mixtures do plainly intimate either a viciousness to be corrected, or a weakness to be supplied, in every one of the simples which are by human wisdom tempered together in order to some effect. Now it were great wickedness to charge either of these on the pure and perfect word of God, and, consequently, to use deceit and insincerity by adulterating it, either by such glosses as diminish and take away from its force, as the Pharisees did in their carnal interpretations, (confuted by our Saviour, Matt. v. 21, 27, 38, 43,) or by such superinducements of human traditions as argue any defect, which they also used, Matt. xv. 2, 9. Human arts and learning are of excellent use, as instruments in the managing and searching, and as means and witnesses in the explication, of holy writ, when piously and prudently directed to such uses. But to stamp any thing of a mere human original with a Divine character, and obtrude it on the consciences of men, (as the papists do their unwritten traditions,) to bind to obedience; to take any dead child of ours (as the barlot did, 1 Kings iii. 20) and lay it in the bosom of the Scripture, and father it on God; to build any structure of ours in the road to heaven, and stop up the way; is one of the highest and most daring presumptions to which the pride of man can aspire: to erect a throne in the consciences of his fellow creatures, and to counterfeit the great seal of heaven for the countenancing of one's own forgeries, is a sin most severely provided against by God, with special prohibitions and threatenings, Deut. xii. 32; xviii. 20; Prov. xxx. 6; Jer. xxvi. 2. This therefore must be the great care of the ministers of the gospel, to show their fidelity in delivering only the "counsel of God" to his people, Acts xx. 27; to be as the two golden pipes which received oil from the olive branches, and then emptied it into the gold, Zech. iv. 12; first to receive from the Lord, and then to deliver to the people, Isa. xxi. 10; Ezek. ii. 7; iii. 4; 1 Cor. xi. 23; 1 Pet. iv. 11. 2. The people are hereby taught, first, to examine the doctrines of men by the rule and standard of the word, and to measure them there, that so they may not be seduced by the craftiness of deceivers, and may be the more confirmed and comforted by the doctrine of sincere teachers; for though the judgment of interpretation belong principally to the ministers of the word, yet God has given to all believers a judgment of discretion, to "try the spirits," and to search "the Scriptures," "whether those things" which they hear

Vid. Davenant. de iudic. et norma
fidei. Chap. 23. 31.

be so, 1 John iv. 1; Acts xvii. 11; 1 Thess. v. 21: for no man is to pin his own soul and salvation, by a blind obedience, on the words of a man who may mislead him; nay, not on the words of an angel, if it were possible for an angel to deceive, Gal. i. 8; 1 Kings xiii. 18, 21; but only and immediately on the Scripture: otherwise, when the "blind lead the blind," the leader only should "fall into the ditch," and the other go to heaven for his blind obedience in following his guides toward hell; whereas our Saviour tells us "both shall fall into the ditch," though but one be the leader, Matt. xv. 14: xxiii. 15. Secondly, having proved all things, to "hold fast that which is good;" with all readiness to receive the righteous ways of God, and submit to them, how mean soever the instrument be in our eyes, how contrary soever his message be to our wills and lusts. When God manifests his Spirit and word in the mouths

* Criminosior culpa, ubi status honestior.—Qui Christiani dicuntur, si simile aliquid barbarorum impuritatibus facimus, gravius eramus; atrocius enim sub sancti nominis professione peccamus: ubi sublimior est prerogativa, major est culpa. Salvian. lib. 4. Possunt nostra et barbarorum vitia esse paria, sed in his tamen vitis necesse est peccata nostra esse graviora

of his ministers, we are not to consider the vessel, but the treasure, and to receive it as from Christ, who, "unto the end of the world," in the dispensation of his ordinances, "speaketh from heaven" unto the church, Matt. xxviii. 20; 2 Cor. v. 20; 1 Thess. ii. 13; Heb. xii. 25.

III. The twofold use made thereof by different kinds of men.

1. To the just, the Lord's ways are a way of happiness: "The just shall walk in them." And this leads us to

Obs. 6. Obedience, and walking in the right ways of the Lord, is the end of the ministry; that the saints may be perfected, that the body of Christ may be edified, that men may "grow up into" Christ "in all things," Eph. iv. 11—15; that their eyes may be opened, and they turned from "darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God," Acts xxvi. 16—18. The prophet concludes that he has "laboured in vain" if "Israel be not gathered," Isa. xlix. 4, 5; without this "the law of the Lord" is "in vain made," "the pen of the scribes is in vain," Jer. viii. 8; better not know "the way of righteousness," than, having known it, "to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto" us, 2 Pet. ii. 21. We should esteem it a great misery to be without preaching, without ordinances, and so indeed it is; of all famine, that of the word of the Lord is the most dreadful; better be with God's presence in a wilderness, than in Canaan without him, Exod. xxxiii. 15; better "the bread of adversity, and water of affliction," than "a famine" "of hearing the words of the Lord," Isa. xxx. 20; Amos viii. 11: this is "mischief" "upon mischief," when "the law" doth "perish from the priest," and "a vision of the prophet" is sought in vain, Ezek. vii. 26; and yet it is much better to be in this case, without a teaching priest, and without the law, than to enjoy them, and not to walk answerably to them. Where the word is not a savour of life, it is a "savour of death unto death," exceedingly multiplying the damnation of those that despise it, 2 Cor. ii. 16; Matt. xi. 22, 24. 1. Those sins which it finds, it ripens; making them much more sinful than in other men, because committed against greater light and more mercy.* One and the same sin in a heathen, is not so heinous and hateful as in a Christian. Those trees on which the sun constantly shines, have their fruit become ripper and larger than those which grow in a shady and cold place. The rain will hasten the growth as well of weeds as of corn, and make them ranker than in a dry and barren ground. 2. It superadds many more and greater; for the greatest sins of all, are those which are committed against light and grace, John ix. 41; xv. 22—24; sins against the law and prophets, greater than those which are committed against the glimmerings of nature, Ezek. ii. 5; iii. 6, 7; and sins against Christ and the gospel, greater than those against the law, Heb. ii. 2, 3; x. 28, 29: such are, unbelief, impenitency, apostasy, despising of salvation, preferring death and sin before Christ and mercy; judging ourselves unworthy of eternal life. 3. By these means it both hastens and multiplies judgments. The sins of the church are much sooner ripe for the sickle than the sins of Amorites; they are "nigh unto cursing," Heb. vi. 8; "summer fruit," sooner shaken off than others, Amos viii. 1; Jer. i. 11. 12. Christ comes "quickly" to remove his candlestick from the abusers of it, Rev. ii. 5. The word is a rich —Nunquid dicit de Hunnis potest, ecce quales sunt qui Christiani esse dicuntur? nunquid de Saxonibus et Francis, ecce quid faciunt, qui se afferunt Christi esse cultores? Nunquid propter Maurorum efferos mores lex sacro-sancta culpatur?—Evangelia legunt, et impudici sunt; apostolos audiunt, et inebriantur; Christum sequuntur, et rapiunt, &c. Ibid.

Nihil est aliud scientia nostra quam culpa, qui ad hoc factum modo legem novimus ut maiore offensione peccemus. Salvian. lib. 4.

mercy in itself, but nothing makes it effectually and in the event a mercy to us but our walking in it.

Obs. 7. We never make the Scriptures the rule of our life and conversation, till we be first justified. Our obedience to the rule of the law written in the Scriptures, proceeds from those suitable impressions of holiness wrought in the soul by the Spirit of regeneration, which is called the writing of the law in our hearts, Jer. xxxi. 33; 2 Cor. iii. 3; or the casting of the soul into the mould of the word, ὑπεκόσαστε δι' ἐκ καρδίας εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε τύπον διδάχης, Rom. vi. 17. We are never fit to receive God's truth in the love and obedience of it, till we repent and be renewed. "If God," saith the apostle, "will give repentance to the acknowledging of the truth," 2 Tim. ii. 25. "The wise in heart," that is, those that are truly godly, (for none but such are in the Scriptures accounted wise men,) these "will receive commandments: but a prating fool shall fall," Prov. x. 8; where by "prating" I understand cavilling, contradicting, taking exceptions at, and making objections against, the commandment, and so falling and stumbling. To such the apostle James saith, chap. i. 19, "Let every man be swift to hear," that is, ready to learn the will and to receive the commandment of God; but "slow to speak, slow to wrath," that is, careful that he suffer no pride and passion to rise up and speak against the things which are taught: as Job saith, "Teach me, and I will hold my tongue," Job vi. 24. For the only reason why men fret and swell, and speak against the truth of God, is because they will not work righteousness. "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," James i. 20. Therefore men are "contentious," because they love not to "obey the truth," Rom. ii. 8. Disobedience is the mother of gain-saying, Rom. x. 21. When we once resolve to "lay apart all filthiness," then we will "receive with meekness the engrafted word," James i. 21, and not before. None hear God's words but they who are of God, John viii. 47; none hear the voice of Christ but the sheep of Christ, John x. 4, 5. Christ preached is "the power of God, and the wisdom of God," but it is only "unto them which are called;" to others a stumbling-block, and foolishness, 1 Cor. i. 23, 24. "We speak wisdom," saith the apostle, but it is "among them that are perfect," 1 Cor. ii. 6. He that is subject to one prince, cares not greatly to study the laws of another; or if he do, it is in order to curiosity, and not to duty. So long as men resolve of Christ, "We will not have this man to reign over us," Luke xix. 14, so long either they study not his word at all, or it is in order to some carnal and corrupt ends, and not to obedience or salvation.

Hereby we may try our spiritual estate, whether we be just men or no; if we make God's word our way, our rule, our delight, laying it up in our hearts, and labouring to be rich in it, that we may walk with more exactness. It was an ill sign of love to Christ, the Master of the feast, when men chose rather to tend their cattle and grounds than to wait on him, Luke xiv. 18; an ill sign of valuing his doctrine, when the loss of their swine made the Gadarenes weary of his company, Luke viii. 37. There was much work to do in the house, when Mary neglected it all, and sat at her Lord's feet to hear his doctrine, and yet was commended by him for it. He was better pleased to see her hunger after the feast which he brought, than solicitous to provide a feast for him; more delighted in her love to his doctrine, than her sister's care for his entertainment, Luke x. 41, 42. This is one of the surest characters of a godly man, that he makes the word in all things his rule and counsellor, labouring continually to get thereby more acquaintance with God and his holy will,

* Οὐχ αἱ γραφαὶ γεγνώσαν αὐτοὺς αἰτίαι ἀλλ' ἡ σφύριον αὐτῶν κακοφροσύνη. Athanas. de Synod. Arim. et Seleuc.

Prov. x. 14; John xv. 7; Col. iii. 16. It is his way; and every man endeavours to be skillful in the way which he is to travel. It is his tool and instrument; every workman must have that in readiness, to measure and carry on all the parts of his work. It is his wisdom; every one would be esteemed a wise man in that which is his proper function and profession. It is the mystery and trade to which he is bound; and every man would have the reputation of skill in his own trade. It is his charter, which secures all the privileges and immunities which belong to him; and every citizen would willingly know the privileges to which he has a right. It is the testament and will of Christ, wherein are given unto us "exceeding great and precious promises;" and what heir or child would be ignorant of the last will of his father? Lastly, it is the law of Christ's kingdom; and it concerns every subject to know the duties, the rewards, the punishments, which belong to him in that relation.

2. To the wicked the holy and right ways of the Lord, in the ministry of his word, become an occasion of stumbling: "The transgressors shall fall therein." And that in two manner of ways: 1. Of scandal, they are offended at them. 2. Of ruin, they are destroyed by them.

1. By way of scandal, they are offended at them. So it is prophesied of Christ, that as he should be for "a sanctuary" to his people, so to others, who would not trust in him, but betake themselves to their own counsels, he should be for "a stone of stumbling and for a rock of offence; for a gin and for a snare," Isa. viii. 14; "for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign" to be "spoken against," Luke ii. 34. So he saith of himself, "For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind," John ix.

39. And this offence which wicked men take at Christ, is from the purity and holiness of his word, which they cannot submit to: "a stone of stumbling" he is, "and a rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient," 1 Pet. ii. 8; 2 Cor. ii. 14, 15. Thus Christ preached was "a sanctuary" to Sergius Paulus the deputy, and "a stumbling-block" to Dymachus the sorcerer; "a sanctuary" to Dionysius and Damaris, and "a stumbling-block" to the wits and philosophers of Athens; "a sanctuary" to the Gentiles that begged the preaching of the gospel, and "a stumbling-block" to the Jews that contradicted and blasphemed, Acts xiii. 42, 45; the former primarily and per se; for salvation was the purpose of his coming, there was sin enough to condemn the world before; "I came not," saith he, "to judge the world, but to save the world," John xii. 47. The other occasionally, not by any intrinsic evil quality in the word, which is "holy, and just, and good," and deals with all meekness and beseechings, even towards obstinate sinners;* but by reason of the pride and stubbornness of those men who dash against it; as that wholesome meat which ministers strength to a sound man, but feeds the disease of another that sits at the same table with him; the same light which is a pleasure to a strong eye, is a pain to a weak one; the same sweet smells which delight the brain, afflict the matrix when it is distempered; and none of this by the infusion of malignant qualities, but only by an occasional working upon and exciting of those which were before present.

And there are many things in the word of God at which the corrupt hearts of wicked men are apt to stumble and be offended. As, 1. Its profundity and depth,† as containing great mysteries above the discovery or search of created reason. Such is the pride and wantonness of sinful wit, that it knows not how to believe what it cannot comprehend, and must have all doctrines tried at its own bar, and measured by its own balance; as if a man should attempt to weigh out the earth in a pair of scales, or to empty the waters of the sea with a bucket. As soon as Paul mentioned the resurrection, presently the Athenian wits mocked his doctrine, Acts xvii. 32; and it was a great stumbling-block to Nicodemus, to hear that a man "must be born again," John iii. 4. Sarah has much ado to believe beyond reason, Gen. xviii. 12; and Moses himself was a little staggered by this temptation, Numb. xi. 21, 22. A very hard thing it is for busy and inquisitive reason to rest in an ὠ βάθος, "Oh the depth of the riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" and to adore the unsearchableness of his judgments, though even human laws tell us that the reason of law is not always to be inquired into.* The great heresies against the highest mysteries of Christian religion, the Trinity, the two natures of Christ, the hypostatical union, the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, had their first rise among the Grecians, who were then the masters of wit and learning, and esteemed the rest of the world barbarous; † and the old exception which they were wont to take at the doctrine of Christianity, was its "foolishness," 1 Cor. i. 23.

Bonne res neminem scandalizant nisi malum mentium. Tertul. de Veland. Virg. cap. 3.

Vid. Irenaeum, lib. 5. cap. 27.

† Δεῖ μὴ λογισμοῖς ἀνθρώπων εἰδέναι τὰ θεῖα, ἀλλὰ ποῶς τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς διδασκαλίας τοῦ πνεύματος τῶν λόγων ποιεῖται τὴν ἐκτέσιν. Justin. Exposit. Fidei.

2. Its sanctity and strictness, as contrary to the carnal wills and affections of men: for as corruption deifies reason in the way of wisdom, not willingly allowing any mysteries above its own scrutiny and comprehension; so does it deify will with respect to liberty and power, and loves not to have any authority set over that which may confine or restrain it. As Joshua said to Israel, "Ye cannot serve the Lord, for he is a holy God," Josh. xxiv. 19, we may say of the law, We cannot submit to the law, because it is a holy law. "The carnal mind" "is not," cannot be, "subject to the law of God," Rom. viii. 7. Heat and cold will ever be offensive to one another; and such are flesh and Spirit, Gal. v. 17. Therefore, ordinarily, the arguments against the ways of God have been drawn from polite or carnal interests. Jeroboam will not worship at Jerusalem, lest Israel revolt to the house of David, 1 Kings xii. 27. Amos must not prophesy against the idolatry of Israel, for "the land is not able to bear all his words," Amos vii. 10. The Jews conclude Christ must not be let alone, lest "the Romans" "come and take away both" their "place and nation," John xi. 48. Demetrius and the craftsmen will by no means have Diana spoken against, because by making shrines for her they got their wealth, Acts xix. 24, 25. Corruption will close with religion a great way, and "hear gladly," and do "many things" willingly, and part with much to escape damnation; but there is a particular point of rigour and strictness in every unregenerate man's case, which, when pressed close upon, causes him to stumble, and to be offended, and to break the treaty. The hypocrites in the prophet will give "rams," and "rivers of oil," and their "first-born," "the fruit of" their "body for the sin of" their "soul:" "but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with" their "God;" to do away "the treasures of wickedness," "the scant measure," "the bag of deceitful weights," "violence," "lies," the "deceitful" "tongue," "the statutes of Omri," or "the works of the house of Ahab;" durus sermo, this is intolerable: they will rather venture "smiting" and "desolation," than be held to terms so severe, Micah vi. 6—16. The young man will come to Christ, yea, run to him, and kneel, and desire instruction touching the way to eternal life, and walk with much care in observation of the commandments; but if he must part with all, and instead of great possessions, take up a cross and follow Christ, and fare as he fared, this is indeed a hard saying; he that came "running," went away "grieved" and "sad," and on this one point do he and Christ part, Mark x. 17, 22. Herod will hear John gladly, and do many things, and observe and reverence him as a just and holy man; but in the case of Herodias he must be excused, on this issue he and salvation shake hands, Mark vi. 20, 27. This is the difference between hypocritical and sincere conversion: that goes far, and parts with much, and proceeds to almost; but when it comes to the very turning point, and ultimate act of regeneration, it then plays the part of "an unwise son," and stays "long in the place of the breaking forth of children," Hos. xiii. 13; as a foolish merchant, who, in a rich bargain of a thousand pounds, breaks upon a difference of twenty shillings. But the other is contented to part with all, to suffer the loss of all, to carry on the treaty to a full and final conclusion, to have all the armour of the strong man taken from him, that Christ may divide the spoils, Luke xi. 22; Psal. cxix. 128; to do the hardest duties if they be commanded, Gen. xxii. 3.

3. The searching, convincing, and penetrating quality which is in the word, is a great matter of offence to wicked men, when it cuts them to the heart, as Stephen's sermon did his hearers, Acts vii. 54. Light is of a discovering and manifesting property, Eph. v. 13, and for that reason is hated by "every one that doeth evil," John iii. 20; for though the pleasure of sin to a wicked man be sweet, yet there is bitterness in its root and issue; he who loves to enjoy the pleasure cannot endure to hear of the guilt. Now the work of the word is to "take" men "in their own heart," Ezek. xiv. 5; to make "manifest" to a man "the secrets of his heart," 1 Cor. xiv. 25; to pierce like arrows "the heart of the king's enemies," Psal. xlv. 5; to divide asunder the "soul and spirit," "the joints and marrow," and to be "a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart," Heb. iv. 12; Isa. xlix. 2. This act of discovery cannot but exceedingly gall the spirits of wicked men; it is like the voice of God unto Adam in Paradise, Adam, "where art thou?" Gen. iii. 9; or like the voice of Ahijah to the wife of Jeroboam, "I am sent to thee with heavy tidings," 1 Kings xiv. 6.

4. The plainness and simplicity of the gospel is likewise matter of offence to the wicked, 2 Cor. x. 10; and that partly for the preceding reason; for the more plain the word is, the more immediate access has it to the conscience, and the more effect upon it. Mere human elegance, fineness of wit, and delicacy of expression, oftentimes stop at fancy, and take possession of that, as the body of Asahel caused the passers-by to stand still and gaze, 2 Sam. ii. 23. And wicked men can be contented to admit the word any whither, so they can keep it out of their conscience, which is its only proper subject, 2 Cor. iv. 2. When I hear men magnify quaint and polite discourses in the ministry of the word, and speak against sermons that are plain and wholesome, I look upon it not so much as an act of pride, (though the wisdom of the flesh is very apt to scorn the simplicity of the gospel,) but indeed as an act of fear and cowardice; because, where all other external trimmings and dresses are wanting to tickle the fancy, there the word has the more weighty and downright operation on the conscience, and must consequently the more startle and terrify.

5. The great difficulty, and indeed impossibility, of sunt ratio reddi potest, et ideo rationes eorumque constituntur, inquiri non oportet. P. lib. I. T. 4. Leg. 21. 21.

† Vid. Hooker. hb. 5. 3. Mater omnium haereticorum superbia. Aug. de Gen. contr. Manicheos, lib. 2. cap. 8.

* Οὐδὲ γὰρ οὐδὲ ἄνθρωποι νόμους τιθένται τὸ εὐλογον ἀπὸ τοῦ ἰχθυοῦ καὶ παντοῦ φαινομένου. Plutarch de sera numinis vindicta. Non omnium quæ a majoribus constituta obeying the word in its strictness and rigour, is another ground of scandal; that God in his word should command men to do that which indeed cannot be done. This was matter of astonishment to the disciples themselves, when our Saviour told them that it was "easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God," Mark x. 25. This was the cavil of the disputant in the apostle against the counsels of God, "Why doth he yet find fault?" if he harden whom he will, why does he complain of our hardness, which it is impossible for us to prevent, because none can resist his will? Rom. ix. 19. Now to this scandal we answer, first, that the law of God was not originally,* nor is it intrinsically or in the nature of the thing, impossible; but accidentally, and by reason of natural corruption, which is enmity against it. A burden may be very portable in itself, which he who is a cripple may not be able to bear. The defect is not in the law, but in us, Rom. viii. 3. Secondly, that this impossibility there may be made a most excellent use,† that being convinced of impotency in ourselves, we may have recourse to the perfect obedience and righteousness of Christ, to pardon all our violations of it, Gal. iii. 21, 24. Thirdly, being regenerated and endued with the Spirit of Christ, the law becomes evangelically possible to us again; † yea, not only possible, but sweet and easy, Rom. vii. 22; 1 John v. 3; Matt. xi. 30: though impossible to the purpose of justification and legal covenant, which require perfection of obedience under pain of the curse, Gal. iii. 10; in which sense it is a yoke which cannot be borne, Acts xv. 10, a commandment which cannot be endured, Heb. xii. 20; yet possible to the purpose of the acceptance of our services done in obedience to it, the spiritual part of them being presented by the intercession, and the carnal defects covered by the righteousness, of Christ, in whom the Father is always well pleased. Fourthly, if any wicked man presume to harden himself in the practice of sin under this pretence, that it is impossible for him to avoid it, because God hardeneth "whom he will," though the apostolical inprecation be answer sufficient, "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God?" Rom. ix. 20; yet he must further know, that he is not only hardened judicially by the sentence of God, but most willingly also by his own stubborn love of sin, and giving himself over to sinning with all greediness, and thereby actively brings on himself those indispositions to duty, so that the law being impossible to be performed by him is indeed no other than he would himself have it to be, as bearing an active enmity and antipathy unto it.

6. The mercy and free grace of God in the promises are to wicked men an occasion of stumbling, while they turn it into "lasciviousness," and "continue in sin that grace may abound," Rom. vi. 1; Jude 4; and venture to make work for the blood of Christ, not being led by "the goodness of God" "to repentance," but hardening themselves in impenitency because God is good, Rom. ii. 4. There is not any thing at which wicked men more ordinarily stumble than at mercy, as gluttons surfeit most on the greatest dainties; venturing upon this ground to go on in sin, because they cannot out-sin mercy; and to put off repentance from day to day, because they are still under the offers of mercy;

* Non fuit impossibile quando præceptum est, sed stultitia peccatis impossibile sibi fecit. Gul. Paris. de Vitiis et Peccat. cap. 10. Neque enim suo vitio non implebatur lex, sed vitio præudentiæ carnis. Aug. de Spir. et Lit. cap. 19.

† Nec latuit præceptorem præcepti pondus hominum excedere vires: sed iudicavit utile ex hoc ipso sua illos insufficientiæ adiuverit—Ergo mandando impossibilia non prævaricantes homines fecit sed humiles, ut omne os obstruat, et making mercy not a sanctuary to which to fly from sin, but a sanctuary to protect and countenance sin; and so by profane and desperate presumption turning the very mercy of God into a judgment, and savour of death unto themselves, pretending liberty from sin that they may continue in it, and abuse God by his own gifts, Deut. xxix. 19, 20; Numb. xv. 30.

7. The threatenings of God set forth in his word, and executed in his judgments on wicked men, are great occasions of stumbling to them, when they are not thereby, with Manasses, humbled under God's mighty hand, but, with Pharaoh, hardened the more in their stubbornness against him. There is such desperate wickedness in the hearts of some men, that they can even sit down and rest in the resolutions of perishing, resolving to enjoy the pleasures of sin while they may: "Tomorrow we die," therefore in the mean time "let us eat and drink," 1 Cor. xv. 32. "Behold, this evil is of the Lord; what should I wait for the Lord any longer?" 2 Kings vi. 33. There are three men in the Scripture that have a special brand or mark of ignominy set upon them, Cain, Dathan, and Ahaz. "The Lord set a mark upon Cain," Gen. iv. 15. "This is that Dathan," and, "This is that king Ahaz;" Numb. xxvi. 9; 2 Chron. xxviii. 22. And if we examine the reasons, we shall find that the sin of stubbornness had a special hand in it. Cain's offering was not accepted, on this he grew wroth and sullen, and stubborn against God's gentle warning, and slew his brother. Dathan and his companions, sent for by Moses, return a proud and stubborn answer, "We will not come up," "we will not come up," Numb. xvi. 12, 14. Ahaz, greatly distressed by the king of Syria, by the Edonites, by the Philistines, by the Assyrian, and in the midst of all this distress stubborn still, and trespassing "yet more against the Lord," 2 Chron. xxviii. 22. It is one of the saddest symptoms in the world for a man, or a nation, not to be humbled under the correcting hand of God, but, like an anvil, to grow harder under blows; and a most sure argument that God will not give over, but go on to multiply his judgments still, for he will overcome when he judgeth, and therefore will judge till he overcome. In musical notes there are but eight degrees, and then the same are repeated again; and philosophers, when they distinguish degrees in qualities, usually make the eighth degree the highest: but in the wrath of God against those who impenitently and stubbornly stand out against his judgments, we shall find no fewer than eight and twenty degrees threatened by God himself; "I will punish you seven times more," and yet "seven times more," and again, "yet seven times," and once more, "seven times for your sins," Lev. xxvi. 18, 21, 24, 28. Thus wicked men do not only stumble at the word by way of scandal, but also,

2. By way of ruin, because they are sure in the end to be destroyed thereby; for the rock stands still, the ship that dashes against it only is broken. God's word is and will be too hard for the pride of men; the more they resist it, the mightier will it appear in their condemnation. The weak corn which yields to the wind is not harmed by it; but the proud oak which resists it is many times broken in pieces. The soul which submits to the word is saved by it; the soul which rebels against it is sure to perish. Therefore since the subditus fiat omnis mundus Deo, quia ex operibus legis non iustificabitur omnis caro coram illo: accipientes quippe mandatum, et sentientes defectum, clamabimus in cælum et miseribitur nostri Deus. Beraud. Ser. 50. in Cantic.

† Lex data, ut gratia quaeretur, gratia data et lex impleatur. Aug. de Sp. et Lit. c. 19. Omnia fiant charitati facilia. De Nat. et Grat. cap. 69. De Grat. Christ. cap. 9. De Grat. et Lib. Arb. cap. 15.

Vide que de Sandrasapale, Nuan, Bacchide, Xantia, alius, congressi Athenas. Lib. 8. cap. 3. et lib. 12. c. 7.

word comes not to any man in vain, but returns glory to God either in his conversion or in his hardening, it greatly concerns every man to come to it with meek, penitent, docile, tractable, believing, obedient resolutions; and to consider how vain and desperate a thing it is for a potsherd to strive with a rod of iron; for the pride and wrath of man to give a challenge to the justice and power of God; for briars and thorns to set themselves in battle against fire. As "our God is a consuming fire" himself, so his law is "a fiery law," Heb. xii. 29; Deut. xxxiii. 2; and his word in the mouths of his ministers "a fire," Jer. v. 14; xxiii. 29. If we be "gold" it will "purify" us; if "thorns," it will "devour" and feed upon us. "This is the condemnation," saith our Saviour, "that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." John iii. 19. There was condemnation in the world before, while it lay in darkness and in mischief, and knew not whither it went; but not so heavy condemnation as that which grows out of light. When physic, which should remove the disease, co-operates with it, then death comes with the more pain and the more speed. The stronger the conviction of sin is, the deeper will be the wrath against it, if it be not by repentance avoided. No surfeit more dangerous than that of bread, no judgment more terrible than that which grows out of mercy known and despised: "The word that I have spoken," saith Christ, "the same shall judge" you "in the last day," John xii. 48. Every principle of truth which is by the word begotten in the hearts of disobedient sinners, and is held down and suppressed by unrighteousness, lies there like fire raked up under ashes, which at that great day will kindle into an unquenchable flame. The word can bring much of hell upon the spirit of impenitent sinners here; it can hew, and cut, and pierce, and burn, and torment, and root out, and pull down, and destroy, and strike with trembling and amazement, sinners the proudest and most secure, Hos. vi. 5; Acts vii. 54; Heb. iv. 12; Isa. xlix. 2; Psal. xlv. 5; Rev. xi. 5, 10; Jer. i. 10; 2 Cor. x. 4; Acts xxiv. 25. We need no messenger from the dead to tell us of the torments there. All the rhetoric in hell cannot set forth hell more to the life than Moses and the prophets have done already, Luke xvi. 31. But oh what a hell will it be at last, when the word which warned us of it shall throw us into it! when every offer of mercy which we have refused, and every threatening of wrath which we have despised, shall accompany us to the tribunal of Christ to testify against us, and into the fire of hell to upbraid us with our own perdition! Oh the doleful condition of impenitent sinners! if they have not the word they perish for the want, and if they have it they perish doubly for the contempt of it. Oh that men would consider the terror of the Lord and be persuaded; and that they would learn so much wisdom as not to arm the very mercy of God against themselves! A bridge is made to give us a safe passage over a dangerous river, but he who stumbles on the bridge is in danger to fall into the river. The word is given as a means to carry us over hell into heaven, but he who stumbles and quarrels at this means shall fall in thither, from whence otherwise he had been delivered by it.

GENERAL INDEX.

A

	PAGE
ABILITIES, natural	59
"Abominations according as they loved"	402, 403
Abundance abused, leads to want	106
Abuse of the poor, sign of a base spirit	294
of God's mercies, some reason against the	422 of mercies forfeits mercies	593
Achor, valley of	134
Acquisitions, sinful, are cursed	125
Actions, wicked, what part God has in them	303, 594
Activity, Christian, its nature and necessity	34, 35
Administrations, God's, will be accomplished	307
of God's grace are in Christ's hands	21
Admonishing, there is a time to give over	220
Admonition, disregard to, a precursor of destruction	219
Admonitions to those who serve a hard service	540 against ingratitude	541
to apostates	543 against trusting in matters of faith and worship to our own understandings	551
respecting the regulation of our desires	570, 571
to unbelievers	589
to presumptuous sinners	631
Adornings, evil of outward	444
Adulterers, Tertullian's sentiments respecting	216
Adultery, enormity of the sin of	216
Adversity, some effects of	27
Affections, sudden, not to be relied on	548
Affliction, supports of the soul in times of	49, 92, 314
times of, are night-times	318
men see their need of God in times of	356 knowledge is a working knowledge	397
its two evils	619
Afflictions of the church move God's compassion	49 increase with sin	89, 302
in times of, God is the only rest for the soul	92
often open the way to the heart	132
great, the time for God's special mercies	133 of the saints, the harbingers of mercy	133
the heaviest, should not lead us to forsake God	186
sanctified, their effect	193, 306
their effect on men's spirits	218 compared to earthquakes	306
the sorest, which befall the people of God, are intended for their good	308
should not discourage us in seeking God	308
the church has none unfulfilled by a morning	318
misery of the wicked in	440 the deepest, sometimes precede the greatest mercy	514
Aggravations, divers, of men's sins	351, 466, 473, 481, 486, 502, 522, 534, 537, 541, 548, 552, 560, 563, 600
Agreement in error worse than division for truth's sake	39
All sin must be renounced	620
the good we have is from God	623
Allure her," "I will	130
Alterations in a government	546
religion	547
God can soon make mighty	501
Ambrose's expostulation with Theodosius	322
Amendment, how conversion works a general	641, 644
Anarchy of Ephraim	608
England	608
Ancestors, their piety should induce us to turn to God	523
divers remarks respecting our	401, 540, 541
"And," such particles have sometimes great force	73, 402
Anger, God knows them that trust him in the midst of his	27
Answers to prayers	656
Antichrist, remarks on	201

	PAGE
Antichristianism, peculiarity of	44
Antinomianism	230, 671
Apostacy, precedes rejection	26
Latimer's caution against	95
Israel's civil	357
no stop in	548
exhortation against	549
there is a two-fold	653
Apostates, two sorts of	94
their hearts much require comfort	139 are seldom inclined to return to God	273
admonition to	543
some steps which mark their departure from
God	549
Appointment, God's, of a place or thing consecrates it	238
Armies, their success depends on God	14
great, the confidence of carnal hearts	457
"Asshur shall not save us"	628
Assurance, a believer's duty and privilege	590, 654
Atheism, of Ephraim	609
England's sin	609
Austin, quoted	7
an excellent speech of his	463
his opinion regarding an official lie	509
Authority, it is Satan's course to get false worship	294 backed by	294
man's, not sufficient in matters of religion	294
Authorities, constituted, what circumstances warrant us in disobeying, with cautions respecting it	395
honour due to	545

B

Baal	97
"he offended in	544
"Baali," its signification	146
Babylon, spiritual, and its children	76
Backsliders, reasonings of their hearts	93, 94
exhortations to	94, 95, 365 possibility of their attaining their former state	95
admonition to	194
some reasons why men become	488
Backsliding, why that sin is particularized here	649 meaning of the word	653
caution against	94, 651
"Bands of love"	474, 476
Base men will do base things	420
Beginnings of great excellencies sometimes very mean and low	66
we should not rest in stirrings and	324
the meamer are men's, the more imperious are they in power	545
Believers' children, grounds of comfort respecting them	409 death	589
assurance	590
Bernard, quoted	39
Besetting sin, opposition to our, an argument of the sincerity of our conversion	643, 675
Beth-arhel	459
Beth-aveu, same as Beth-el	248
Beth-el	520
"Bethroth," why repeated thrice here	173
Birth-days, celebration of, and cautions respecting it	344
Bishop, a, in the Scriptures, every presbyter	146
Bitterness of sin	599, 600
why the wicked are not sensible of the	539

	PAGE		PAGE
Blessedness of heaven, in what it consists	23	Church, a true, may have in it corruptions and omissions	61
Blessings, become sweeter by remembering God in them	557	of God, in itself God's garden	71
sin corrupts	619	made "a wilderness"	71
Blindness, when beneficial	90	a national, involves national worship	115
"Blood touch'd blood"	217	the, must not worship God after the manner of idolaters	148, 150
Bolton's, Mr., death-bed address to his children	77	should increase under the rain of God's blessing	318
Bondage, of the creature	117	its afflictions are ever followed by a morning of God, its excellency	390 implies three things	140	compared to a vine for many reasons	417
peculiar severities of the Egyptian	141	its privilege to be beloved of God	462
Boundary, the proper, for the ministrations of the preacher, and the faith of the hearer	683	God's first-born	464
Bounds, means given by God to keep princes within	291	its time for prevailing is its hour of greatest weakness	516
Bow, a, deceitful two ways	353	God often effects great things for it by small means	541
Bravest, tears before God become the	517	its condition in this world	647, 648
"Bread of mourners"	391, 392	compared to a tree inverted	661
Britons, origin of their name	66	its growth and spreading is derived from "The Branch"	661
their low and mean beginnings	66	characteristics presented by the body of the the, its reformation, wherein it should resemble Paul's Epistles	665
Brotherly-kindness, necessity and excellency of	321	some matter of singular comfort in the troubles of the	675
"Burden of the king of princes"	368, 369	Cities of refuge	335
Business, the Christian's most important	675	there are all kinds of evil in great	338
C
Canaanite, its primary signification	527	Clergy, the people so called in contradistinction to the ministers	60
Care and purpose of general amendment, the, wrought by conversion	611-644	the, if wicked, are the worst of all men	336
Carnal obedience	11	a wicked, overwhelms whole nations	336 hearts, mark not the withdrawals of God	280	Clergymen, none so cruel as wicked	336
make little conscience of duties	332	cruelty in them most abominable	336
not to be engaged by the greatness of God's love	402	Close-handed, a true Christian is not	321
their selfishness	420	Closeness of walk with God begets security	496
vanity of their confidences	457, 564	Comfort to the godly	674
their extenuations of their guilt	533	Comforts, much praise is due to God for outward Christian, their solid foundation	654
confidences, God loves to pour contempt on	564	"Comfortably," what is meant by speaking	131
true repentance takes the heart off from	645	Commands for false worship easily prevail	295
Cause, even the worst, will have learned and judicious advocates	398	Commission, Hosea's, to Israel	3
Causes, second, some observations on	178, 179	Commons, exhortations to the members of the house of	622, 623, 625
their dependence on the first great Cause	669	Communion with a church, in what cases it may be declined	61, 62
Chancels, remarks respecting them	149	with God in holy things sanctifies the creature	117
Cheat and oppress, some considerations for those who	529	of saints to be prized	417, 464
Chemarim, signification of the word	434	with God, the trial and foundation of all our goodness	621
Children, may plead with their parents	57	of saints, much of it consists in joining in God's praises	638
their different treatment at birth by different nations	65	mutual, of the members of the church	664
little hope of those educated wickedly	76	Comparisons drawn by God from four sources	592
usually follow their parents' example	77	Compassion for their offspring should deter parents from sin	13
are committed to their parents by God	283	of God towards us should excite compassion in us	320
grievous to lose them in hopeful maturity	404	Concilium Antisiodorens	119
why they should suffer for their parents' sins	407, 408, 602	Concord, between the will of man converted, and the grace of God converting	670
of believers, grounds of comfort respecting them	409	Condescension of God	298, 305 should requite their parents' love	469	Condition, it is very useful for one to consider his former low	69, 122
their parents' piety a reproach to wicked	511	a reconciled, is a singing	142 should not marry without or against their parents' consent	540	God sometimes leaves his people in a dead faith realizes God's reviving mercies in the saddest	312
Choleric disposition, a, none of God's image	495	Confidence can be reposed confidently in none but God	645
Christ, his supremacy over angels	40	Conscience, liberty of	483
the sole legitimate Head of the church	40, 48, 60	it is a great evil to strive with one's blessing of a clear	489
nothing gotten by departing from	98	the, should not be dealt with severely cauterized, many covetous men have	533
his blood alone sweetens the things of earth	117	Consciences, tender, should not be dealt with severely cauterized, many covetous men have	529
the strength of the church	151	Consolation, humiliation precedes	579
his death and resurrection a special help to faith in affliction	314	Contentions, God carries on no causeless	206, 217
our Gospel-altar	370	Controversy, the impatient soul's, with God	212
all our fruit must be given to	420	God's, with England	203, 208
in all he does, God has reference to	465	with Judah	510
Christians, private, may plead with a church	60	Conversion, some considerations to quicken sinners to remarks on, and motives to	616, 617, 675
Chrysostom on the value of the Scriptures	1	thankful obedience, a mark of true	629
Church, God will always have a	18	some tests to try the truth of our	638
its increase from God	30	true, consists of two parts	611 its increase, a legitimate matter of joy	31	works a special cure against a man's more particular sins	643, 675
God has a time in which he will bring peace to his	36
Christ the sole legitimate Head of the	40
some things wherein it differs from other societies	41, 42
three consequences which follow from Christ being the Head of the	44, 45
the greatness of its misery no hinderance to the exhibition of God's mercy	48 its members, their duty towards it	58 its members should be enlightened	58

	PAGE
Conversion, true, takes the heart off from carnal confidences	644
Conviction, should precede correction	7 should proceed at once to conversion	583
two great hinderances to	584
Convictions, inefficacy of mere	423
of the Spirit, we should beware of resisting them	584
Cornelius a Lapidè, his audacious lie	218
Corrupt hearts, many things in God's word to offend	685
Corruptions within breed our trouble and undoing	298
deviations in God's worship trifling in our eyes, God may account gross	387
in worship causes God's withdrawal	547
Counsels, perplexed, foreshadow a fall	241
what should be sedulously kept from our	436
some suggestions how to direct aright our	436
Covenant mercy is indeed excellent mercy	154
God's, with man	181
its three-fold character	334
God's goodness enables us to enter into	334
God's constancy in his	334
the sense of our obligations should keep us within the	334
breach of, a most grievous aggravation of sin	335
-breakers, men may do many services and yet be	335
with God, implies mercy to man	335
the great cause of man's breach of the	335
in what respects the heart may be false with regard to a	428
the, the foundation of the saints' comfort	519
with God, some reasons to constrain us to enter into	629—631
some remarks on man's	632, 633
some considerations to quicken our diligence in keeping	634, 635
Creature, bondage of the	103
-comforts avail little in the day of God's wrath man cannot impart holiness, much less divinity, to a	361
-promises, we shall find them all but a lie	389
the, its dependence on God	405
-engagements, their nature	412
the, experience of its vanity leads not a carnal heart to seek God	427
some considerations which should be mixed with our enjoyment of the	554
some reasons why we should not trust in the	646
-helps, all defective in something	663
Creatures, God's, should be employed in God's service	100
the, their dependence on man	219
we should make a spiritual use of God's work in his	319
Cures, desperate sores require desperate	598
Custom in evil excuses us not	360
Cyril, an excellent remark of his	64

D

Danger apprehended as present and real affects the heart most	286
"David their king"	194—197
Day, God and his Jezreel shall have a great	50, 51
of Jezreel," in what respects great, and what motives result from its greatness	51—54
Days, hints for rightly setting apart	107, 110 of the week, their heathenish origin	117
"    in the latter	200
Dead body, a, uncleanness from contact with	391
Death and resurrection of Christ a special help to faith in affliction	314
Deceit," "balances of	528
Decision, some thoughts to lead to	489
exhortation to	490
Deering's faithfulness, when preaching before Queen Elizabeth	69
Deification of a creature	361
Deliverance, God ties not himself to outward means in without bow and without sword, a great mercy	22
through Christ is especially sweet	116
from spiritual bondage is a mercy for ever to be celebrated	116 out of the hand of God there is no	304
what effect it should have on the heart	314
God's, of his people, what it teaches	315

	PAGE
Deliverance, God's mode of, is gradual	318
Despair, the wonderful evil of	440
arguments against	463, 467, 534,
Deities, to promote superstition	264
man's, in the worship of God, do but pollute it	370
Difference, between true and false worshippers God will make a	19
a slight, in religion sometimes the source of bitter enmities	36 between the scattering of the saints and the scattering of the sinners	38 between officers in a civil state and officers in a church	41
Difficulty, the best men are not to be depended on in times of	301
Di Minores of the heathen and papists	127
Disappointment in a way of a sin is a great mercy	91
Diseases, drunkenness is attended by	341, 345
Dispensations, God's, are often disregarded	98
Divisions resulting from truth better than the union that comes by error	39, 40
Doctrine of papists and language of Scripture diametrically opposed	224
"Door of hope," difficulties lying at the nation's	135—137
Dove, a silly, Ephraim compared to	349
the, not the eagle, to be offered in sacrifice	355
Drunkenness, is an old court sin	345 brings disease	341, 345
professors should especially beware of	345
Duties, carnal, flow from a base heart	260 dependence on them creates a distraction of spirit	278
to find God in them; the true end of all holy	279
the, of the first and second table are to be joined	333 should mightily engage us against sin	352
God remembers the sins of the ungodly, especially in the performance of	352
many love to hear of privileges, not of	584

E

Eagle, the, in the law an unclean bird	355
Eagles, wicked men compared to	355
Early, when the Jews may be said to have sought God	308
seeking is acceptable seeking to God	308
when men are said to seek God	308, 309
Ἐργον βασισθε	128
Election, doctrine of	511, 512
Engagements, we should labour to get our hearts off	324
earthly	324
England, God's controversy with, and its evidences	203, 204
English moistens, some remarks on	210
Ephod, the, remarks on	189, 190
"Ephraim is joined to idols"	251
"    As a moth unto	360
how he hath mixed himself with the Gentiles	347 is a cake not turned"	348
compared to a silly dove without heart	349 compared to a wild ass	366
his weakness set forth by four similitudes	551
Errand, Hosea's, to Israel	3
Estrangement of the heart from the law of God, several degrees of it enumerated	379
Eusebius's Antiquities quoted	186, 476
Evil, dishonour before lovers is a great and sore	104 present, apprehension of it terrifies the soul	396
Example of others an excuse for us	277
Excellency, the, of saints, God has a time to convince men of it	32
Excellencies, great, their beginnings sometimes very low and mean	66
manifest, in God's law	375
Exhortations, God's, to a people argue their hopefulness	63
Expiation, the feast of, divers things in	120, 121
Exposition, an ancient practice	1
Extremity, God often brings the wicked into hopeless	72
man's, is God's opportunity	367
Eye of God is upon men's hearts	268, 269
is upon his people for their comfort	315

F

Faith realizes God's reviving mercies in the saddest condition	313
raises the soul high	315
has strength to wrestle even with Jehovah	522

	PAGE
Humility, some reasons for	673, 674
Hypocrisy of the Jews, evidenced in three things	321 especially grieves the Spirit of God	323
is full of danger to man	323
Hypocrites, import of their desires	352
confide much in their outward and formal acknowledgment of God	356
I
I, and will , Luther's remarks on	82
Idolaters, it is difficult to convince them of their sin	56
usually entertain good thoughts of their idols	83 pursue with eagerness their idolatries	84
the number of their idols	84
the end of their worship is very low	84
there should be no conformity between the church of God and	148
are devoid of right understanding	243
their hearts are strongly attached to their idolatries	252 are deep in their policies	266 their fulness of pride	274
are great oppressors	294
further their false worship by lies	343
their idols shall fail them at last	360
their love for their idols	366
Idolatry, a kind of spiritual fornication	8
and sensuality usually conjoined	10 continuance in it will strip a nation of all its glory	67
human nature prone to	88
not easily expelled	100
has many covers	104
most loathsome and abominable	147
the most trifling things tending to it must be avoided	147
God's people should keep far off from	148
how far God's commands to the Jews respecting it bind us	149 is shameless and loves publicity	230
is a lie in God's esteem	343 is a kind of hereditary sin	361 is a very growing sin	550 and idolaters, general remarks on 433, 434, 438, 460, 547, 550, 551, 603
Ignorance, affected, excuses not, but aggravates guilt	99
some of the causes of	210, 211
dangerous and destructive in many respects	225
a great hinderance to conviction	584
Images and pictures, remarks on	211
not required by God's people	522
Impatience of spirit in trouble to be guarded against	312, 313
Impenitent sinners are unwise	584
Impetuousity of spirit blinds the mind	274
Impurities, extremities warrant	617
Impunity in sin, not to be secured by community	261
Increase typical of prayer	128
Inconstancy in religion especially provokes God's wrath	326
Increase, Judah's and Israel's, its consequence of the church	661—663
Individual arguments to turn to God should be considered	524
Infants, God's secret ways in working on	513 little, are great sinners	601
in what sense termed "innocents"	601
Inferiors, we should preserve the honour of	474
Ingratitude, admonitions against	462, 463, 555—557
Iniquities, God's mercies are beyond men's	493
Inimicum maledictum, finis maledictus	574
Injustice, the Christian's three resources in cases of	431
Institutions, no new, can be introduced into the church	42
Divine, their nature	42
Intimations of love, when God intends good he sends	311
Interests, their own, weigh much with people	412
Interrogations, four pathological, which God asks himself	492
Inventions, men's, are to be destroyed	438
Ireland, massacres in	55
Irish priests, their attainments	210
Irresistibility of God's judgments	595
Ishi, signification of the word	146
Israel, its condition in Egypt	65 its two-fold ground of confidence	437
its childhood	462
God's bands to draw	474, 475
seven reasons given for its anxiety to have a king	565

J

	PAGE
Jacob, why the ten tribes are called by his name	510
his taking his brother by the heel	511 wrestling with the angel	513 strength	514
weeping	517
prayer, excellent ingredients in it	518
interviews with God at Bethel	519
seed are inheritors of Canaan	519
remarks on his primitive condition	538
his flight into Syria	539
twice seven years service for his wives	539
"Jehovah is his memorial"	521
what effect the consideration of the name should have on us	523
Jehu, character of his obedience and its consequence	11
Jeroboam, character of	573
Jerome, his remarks on the Jews being without an ephod	192
Jerusalem, remarks on	64
Jews, the calling in of the	142
Jezreel, its signification	10
John, the apostle, interesting anecdote of	476
John II. of Portugal, his emblem	479
Joy, three ingredients to be put always into the cup of	385
the, of others aggravates a man's misery	387
Jubilee, observations respecting the day of	114
Judah, observations respecting God's controversy with	510
Judgment, there will be a time when no help shall deliver from	290
for God to tear and wound, and then to leave a people, is a heavy	304
God has a fixed time for	337
when men are hot in sin, God will be hot in the abiding of the sword is a sore	347
the, soon gone when the heart is engaged	486
Judgments, impending, should affect	13, 459 threatened, should lead the saints to the promises	28 suspended, fall heavily	124
secret sins entail secret	297, 298
God's least, can abase the proudest	297
God's hand more immediate in some than in other	303
God's remarkable hand in some, must be regarded	303
God's, may be said to be concealed during sinners' prosperity	327
God's, are gradual	327
God has his time to convince men by his	327, 329
God's ministers must not only proclaim mercies, but also	351
God's, against the wicked are only the beginnings of further	369
on us are nothing but recompences	356
the saints cause the mitigation of	512
stupidity under, is a great judgment	5-1
seldom go alone	597
mercies spiritual should be sought in temporal	626
true ground for the removal of God's	655
Justice, corruption of courts of	430
K
Keys, four, kept in God's hand	409
Kindness of God to us in Christ, in what it consists	168
King, seven reasons for Israel's anxiety to have a	565
Kingdom's, a, sins are its sores	338
Kings, the Persians' usage on the death of their	188
and princes must have sin charged upon them	262
due respect must be shown to	263 and princes, when they may be said to be given in anger	572
Knowledge, nature of the saints'	98
the, of God, its influence on men	209
rejection of, a great sin	225
a very comfortable thing to the saints	316
a gracious heart pants after	316
more than burnt offerings"	333
most excellent	333
gained in afflictions, a working knowledge	397
is operative and working	553

L

	PAGE
Land, the Lord's, Canaan so peculiarly	389
Language of Scripture, and doctrine of papists, diametrically opposed	224
to be used by ministers	591
Latimer's sentiments respecting backsliders	95
Law, the grace of God under the gospel more full and glorious than under the	33
God's, not only to be kept, but to be rejoiced in	118
there are manifold excellencies in God's	375
the things of the, are great things	376
God's, in what respects accounted "as a strange thing"	378
the, makes way for the gospel	579
Laws, human, are of three sorts	43
Layman's books, what are so termed	211
Leagues much rejoiced in, may prove an occasion of sorrow	385
Lebanon, "small as	662, 667
Leopard, God compared to a	558
Lessons taught the wicked when under the hand of God	396
"Let him alone"	252, 255
"Let not Judah offend"	245, 246
Liberty in judging attended with a two-fold peril	43
Lie, a, the very foundation of popery	213
an official, Austin's opinion regarding it	509
Lies, it is an evil thing to make men glad with	343
"the fruit of	455
in God's worship and in God's business not infrequent	505
"he daily increaseth	508
divers ways of multiplying and increasing	508
sources of the multiplication of	509
Life, the seed-time for eternity	363
Light abused, ushers in the grossest darkness	224
God loves to draw forth great sinners to the	461
"Like people, like priest"	230
Lion, "he shall roar like a	503
God compared to a	306, 558
Long-suffering of God must not be abused	547
Lord of hosts, signification of the title	14
how men may frame their doings to turn unto the	271, 272
Christ is the	587
Lod-nahamah	16
Loss of children in hopeful maturity	401
Lost, in being willing to lose for God there is nothing	29
Love, it greatly aggravates sin, to sin against much	182, 462 useful to call to mind God's old	462 has strong bands	476
exhortation to mutual	478
God's, its characteristics	479, 480
difficulties fall before	540
God's free, should beget thankful obedience	655
Loving-kindness of God, good to speak of the	54
Lust, deadness in prayer often occasioned by some secret	348
Luther, quoted	2, 3
complaints of the enmity of former friends	36
his zeal	58
Lying, odiousness of the sin of	212, 213
admonitions against	509

M

Madmen, in what respects the wicked resemble	354
Magistrates, great wrath hangs over wicked	12
what circumstances warrant us in disobeying, and cautions respecting it	336
Man, his perverseness	5, 189
poverty	298
nature, weak and unsettled	334
state truly sad when God is departed from him	401
"I drew them with the cords of a	471 difference in the execution of wrath between God and	500
Many are nearest to their undoing when they think themselves most secure	336
Marriage, caution to be used in contracting	9
used to express gospel mysteries	159
children should not contract it without, or against, their parents' consent	540
Married condition, four things most remarkable in a	159
Martyr's, Peter, illustration of the excellencies of God's ways	167
Martyrs, Book of, quoted	476
Means, in delivering a people, God ties not himself to outward	22

Means, when public are unavailing, there is little hope of private	223
little, God often uses when he intends the greatest mercies	541
Members of a church, the, should be enlightened	58
Memorial, "the Lord is his	521
Men, God has a righteous hand in the worst actions of	303
base, will do base things	420 their own counsels bring shame to them, especially in religion	435 estimate their sins by their success	532
Merchant and Canaanite synonymous in Scripture	527
the calling honourable, but may be rendered very contemptible	528
Mercies, God's, beyond man's	62
national, are but common	67 forgotten, displease God	70
disregarded, injure men	99
God's, should beget godliness	99
in great difficulties are sweet	131
restored and recovered are sweet	144
opening into ordinances are precious	145
new, should recall the old	145
former, should strengthen our faith in future	145 should be met with appropriate thankfulness	145
God's, should lead to reformation	145, 146
covenant, especially sweet	154
God's, are a depth swallowing up all sin and sorrow	171
their fullness in Christ	171
special, if abused draw down special judgments	285
after two days' death are reviving	313
seasonable, some hints respecting them	313
the Lord's, are settled	315
God's, to his people are decreed	318
are both seasonable and suitable	318, 319
God's redeeming, are great aggravations of our sins	351 promised, must be gotten by lawful means	358
God's old, are engagements to duty, and aggravations of sin	463, 534
prepared, provided, and laid before us, are to be prized	484
God's, are beyond men's iniquities	493 promised, should be believed	519
little means often introduce the greatest	541 saving, are great	552
their abuse forfeits them	593
spiritual, should be sought in times of temporal judgments	626
remarks on and promises of several special	466, 482, 552, 668
Mercy, a time in which God will not have	16
men best know its value when taken from them	17 much, may be intended even to persons in great straits	20 peaceful deliverance a great	22
what especially enhances a	27
God's, is a people's glory and beauty	6 for God to make the way of sin difficult is an especial	88 abuse of, causes its removal	100
works of, may be done on the sabbath	109
a, when it may be regarded as a warrant of an additional	135, 317—319
a great, to be delivered from outward bondage	112
when magistrates and people unite in praising God	112
times of, are times of union	310
in time of God's, he puts a mighty spirit into men to seek him	310
apprehension of, causes the heart to rejoice and not sacrifice	328—330
the Lord has a high esteem of	332
"reap in	417
reasons to move God to	491
the greatest, sometimes preceded by the deepest affliction	514
pre-eminence given to it over justice	525
and judgment, their due mixture commended	525
visions multiplied are a great	536
the higher the, the deeper the judgment, if abused	592
Ministerial office, rejection from it, a great judgment	226
Ministers, must expect a variety of conditions	4
their discredit is a hindrance to their work	8
impartiality, how very necessary for	19

	PAGE
Ministers, it is a great aggravation of sin to strive with	222, 223
God's	228
their houses should be sanctuaries	230, 231
and people, their mutual influence	245 should especially regard those to whom they	247
are bound by office	268
rebuking faithfully, God rebukes	286
their rebukes should be impartial rebukes	287, 284 should realize what they preach	287, 284
must proclaim judgments as well as mercies	327
God's, are hewers	336
are God's mouth to his people	354
wicked, are most outrageous against those	363
who secede from them	408
God's, must not be weary of their work	466, 536
when they may be said to sow the wind	469
often perplexed by men's sins	469
amongst us, a proof of God's mercy	495 should imitate God's tenderness	536
must not be easily discouraged	591 should guard against even the appearance of	326 wrath	684
their painful labours God will take account of	105
God's, must use plain and familiar language	106
Ministry, the, not to be despised	26
its end	299
Mirth and sin, their union is a forced union	440
true, remarks on it	562
Misery, a greater, to lose God himself than his gifts	263 men will not seek help till made sensible of	582
their	460
of the wicked in affliction	139, 140
help exists in God for men's greatest	296
Mizpah	59
Modesty of Scripture-language	213
Morning, "in a	146
Moses' song, six things remarkable respecting it	532
Moth, wherein God compares himself to a	261
Multitudes, their opposition no argument against the	270
truth of a doctrine	88
Murder, character of the sin of	334

N

Names, much danger in words and	146
evil things are often veiled under goodly	532
Nation, the priests are not infrequently the causes of	261
all the wickedness in, and judgments on a	270
a defiled, is near to ruin	88
Nature, human, its proneness to idolatry	334
its characteristics	474
God deals with us suitably to our	17, 201
Nearness of a people to God exempts them not from	444 punishment for sin	278
Neck, "her fair	98
Need of God, there is coming a time when even the	110, 111
most wicked will see their	58
Nescientia, as distinguished from ignorantia	318
New moons, how and why observed	411
Nice, the council of	550
Night-times, times of affliction are	550
" No more "	550
Noanconformists, remarks respecting the	550

O

Oaths, remarks respecting	551
Obedience, perfect, in the desire and endeavour must be	12 rendered to God	237
and protection conjoined	295
remarks respecting that which should be	481
rendered to God and man	672
God's three bands to bind man to	684
no confidence to be reposed in our promises	668 of new	59
the end of the ministry	7
Observed him, " I have	59
Occolampadius	7
Offence, God's command takes away all plea of	45
Officers in the church, all, even the meanest, depend	510
on Christ	118
Oil, the produce of Canaana	587
Old age should produce abundant fruit	544
Old Testament, the, remarks on it	544
Opposition to God vain	544

Oppress, some considerations for those who cheat and	529
Oppression in trading	528, 529
Ordinance, prayer is the great prevailing	518
Ordinances, God to be found, if at all, in his own	279
repenting hearts are solicitous about God's	307 natural and instituted	325
God's holiest, are corrupted through man's	335
wickedness	438
of God's appointment, if abused, to be pu-	326
rified, not destroyed	103
Organs in churches, Justin Martyr's sentiments re-	326
specting	103
Ornament, godliness the best	561
Ourselves, we are, our own worst and most effectual	561 enemies	561

P

Pains, more, used to go to hell than to heaven	454
Paphnutius, remarkable circumstance recorded of him	58
Papists and prelatists, character of their unity	37
unjust in their censures of those	60
who plead against them	66, 67
by their idolatries, the cause of	142
the nation's evils	248
are men of blood	3
their abuse of places where some special events	13
have happened	57
Parents, should so live as to be an honour to their	76
children	77
should forbear to sin on account of their off-	78
spring	283
children may plead with their	408, 409
a special mercy to have godly	469 should set good examples	511
wicked, are a disgrace to their children	540 have their children committed to them by God	601
exhortation to	73, 402
their love should be required	116
their piety a reproach to wicked children	580, 603 children should not marry without or against	625
the consent of their	153
wicked, bring judgments on their posterity	155
Particles, their occasional force in the Scriptures	155
Passover, remarks on the	156, 157
Patience of God	156
exhortation to	157
Peace with God brings peace with the creature	666 is a great and most desirable blessing	77
may be bought at too high a price	479
is God's peculiar work and gift	353
through reformation is the way to procure	585
God's, alone brings security	152
in the heart confirms obedience	316
Pelagius, remarks on his doctrine	676
Pelican, the, chosen as an emblem by John II. of Por-	117—119
tugal	143
some advice to a true	179
some comforts for a sincere	230, 231
Penitent, sincere, remember former sins with indigna-	284
tion	293
turn to God that they may know	296
God	308
their prayers are heard and an-	318
swered	319
Pentecost, remarks on	337
People, God's, sometimes lose their first joy	339 are the seed of the earth	388 and minister, their influence on each other	398
a, little hope of them when succeeding genera-	398
tions are wicked	398
it is a great judgment for them to be under	398 oppression	398
how God may be as a moth and rottenness to a	398
God's, in their heaviest afflictions their good	398
is intended	398
account their life to consist in God's	398 favour	398
whence come their deliverances	398
sins of a, are seeds for a harvest of judgment	398
a, their condition desperate when they become	398
worse under the means of healing	398
God's, their sins are aggravated sins	398 rejoice in their ministers keeping close	398
with God	398
are subject to as sore evils here as the	398
worst of men	398

	PAGE		PAGE
People, God's, their sins are especially noticed by God	497	Professors, their falls especially noticed by the ungodly formal, God delights not in their services	279 280
Perfidiousness of man's heart	634	we may meet with worse usage from them than from non-professors	400
Perplexity of the wicked great in times of trouble	287	their example ripens many for judgment	337
moves not God	365	a strong caution to them respecting the sin of drunkenness	345
great, often caused to ministers and saints by men's sins	408	backsliding, admonished	365
Person, indelicate exposure of the, condemned	63	a word of caution to	428
Petrus Waldensis	58	sincere, their paucity	679
Perverseness of men	320	Progenitors' sins entail progenitors' judgments	382
Petitions, our, often answered more exceeding abundantly	656	Progeny, a numerous, accounted a great glory	403
Philadelphia, church of, compared to church of Scotland	136	Promises, the, adversity usually leads to forgetfulness of the strongest saints require a renewal of	27 519
Physician, characteristics of sin's	651	Prophets, the minor, Jerome's remarks on them	1
Places, idolatrons, we must not approach corrupted, lose their honour	249	their falls are falls of the night	224
set apart for God's worship, their corruption remarked on	249 336	Propriety, the, of all is in God	101
Plato, some remarks of his on the true nature of sacrifice	230	Prosperity usually leads men to forget the threatenings begets wantonness	27 99
Pleaders, the devil never winks	57	God's displeasure is often shown at the height of	102
Pleading, God's	206	God's sufferance of wicked	124, 367
we should not neglect it	263	outward, its transitory nature	386, 401, 407
Pleadings should be added to exhortations and admonitions	56	in sin, to be prayed against	532
reformation, and not contention, the true end of all	62	Proud men, their utter vanity	551
Plotted wickedness, its vileness	336	their forgetfulness of God	556
Plots of the wicked, God knows how to defeat them	485	Proudest, the, by his least judgments God can abase them	297
Ploughshare, a few plain truths which should act on the heart as a	450	Punishment, it is a sore, to go unpunished for sin	581
Policy, sinful, leads to ruin	12	never nearer, than when least feared	581
Polytheism leads to atheism	609	Purity of religion in the church, incompatible with slavery in the state	16
Poorness of man's natural condition	218
Pope's, the, canon to silence opposition	222	Q
Popish bondage intolerable	69	Questions and answers, some important, respecting the doctrine of imputed sin	407, 408, 602
casuists, their vile obscenity	582
Posterity, eight sins which especially entail judgments on	602	R
Power, the meane men's beginnings are, the more imperious are they in	545	Rain of God's blessing	318
Praise, the sacrifice of, considered in connexion with the covenant	638	Rational, the ways of God are very	472
Prayer, deadness in it, often occasioned by some secret lust	348	Rationally, God deals with people	471
saints should be bold in seeking God in some encouragements to	498, 496	Reaping shall be as sowing	417, 455 is the great prevailing ordinance	518	Reasons, for God's ultimate withdrawal of mercy	17, 18
of Jacob, excellent ingredients in it	518	some, why men backslide	488
omnipotency of	618	Rebellion, greatness of the sin of	18, 603
causes of the miscarriage of	627	Rebukes, should be tempered with love	55, 56
its efficacy	677	sin is exceeding sinful after	268
exhortations to	54, 515	God has his set time for	289
Prayers denominated howlings in four respects	351	whether sent in anger or in love	289
Preface to the Book of Common Prayer, remarks on the	211	Recompences, judgments on us are none other than	396
Preferment, Luther's contempt of	86	Reconciliation with God, its attendants	133
its influence	86	Reformation, without humiliation, insufficient	43
Preparation for our approaches to God	617	weakness of arguments to render final previous	96, 211
Presages sometimes betoken future eminence	513	glorious shows of, often come to nothing	322
Presence, God's, constitutes the saint's mourning	318	Reformers, the first English	211
Presumptuous sinners, an appeal to	631	Refuge, cities of	335
Prevalence with God insures prevalence with men	515	Reign, to serve God is to	506
Pride leads men to think God's ordinances too plain a secret and a witnessing	275, 276	Rejection, apostacy precedes	225
goes before a fall	276	of knowledge, a great sin	225
of men's hearts	299	"Rejoice with trembling"	386
ordinarily attends on prosperity	555	Relations, for their state we should be especially solicitous	56
evidences a mean, low spirit	556	Relationship to God, its privileges	497
Priests, their proper work	221	Religion, to subject it to carnal policy is shameful	78
Israel's, in Hosea's time, apt emblems of the present popish	229	the most gainful, the most popular	85
usually the causes of all the wickedness in, and judgments on, a nation	261, 335, 336	of those we love, soon adopted	403
Princes, their responsibility to God	291	Remembrancers, the Lord's, their duty	618 of Judah, four-fold character of their transgressions	291	Remission of sins	622 means given by God to keep them within bounds	291, 292	Renovation of man's character	622
much need our prayers	292	Repentance, must be proportionable to men's sins wherein it truly consists	273, 307, 349
wicked, give liberty to men's lusts	296	death-bed, little dependence to be placed on	394 their obstinacy	411	we should gather together every argument to incite to	498
their vanity	437	exhortation to	498
Prison, Ridley and Latimer's sweet concord in	413	of no kind can be accepted without restitution	539
Privileges, none preserve the disobedient from ruin	52	remarks on	500, 561
Professed sins are shameful sins	82	an invitation to	616
Profession, open, five reasons for it at all times	83	institution how to perform	617
Professors, their sins most offend God	217	a Christian's work in trouble	618
		sweetens judgments	619

	PAGE		PAGE
Repentance, links of the golden chain of	628	Scriptures, the, Chrysostom's and Luther's estimation of	1, 2
unsound, unaccompanied with thankfulness	639	frame of heart necessary for studying them aright	2 works a special care against besetting sins	643, 675	delight in them, a proof of advance in grace	2
true, takes the heart off from carnal confidences	644	the, we should regard them as concerning ourselves	375
its proper work	645	there is a sweet harmony and consent in the rule of our life after conversion	588
its roots	648	contain many things to offend corrupt hearts	685—687
Repenting church, the, answers to its doubts	158	Secret sins entail secret judgments	297, 298
Reproach on God, divers ways whereby a creature can bring	543	Security, closeness of walk with God begets	496
Reprobation, remarks on	252, 254	Seed, in what respects saints are God's	49
Reproofs, our misery great when we have succeeded in ridding ourselves of	220	-time, the, for eternity, life is	363
Reprovers should be themselves unrebukable	56	Seeds, men's actions are	447
Resolved spirits, their success	516, 547	Seek the Lord, some reasons why we should now	451
Restitution, repentance altogether imperfect without	530	Seekers aright, are effectual	453
Revolving speeches, a foul evil	61	Seeking God early, enjoined and commended	308, 309
Revivals of God's people	312	motives to continue	453
Rhemist Testament, the	146	Self appears in sin, some respects in which	561
Rich in this world, the, cautions to them	555	-love, some remarks on	279
Ridley and Hooper, the scene of their agreement	36, 443	-seeking eats out all true devotion	380, 381
Righteousness, "sow to yourselves in signification of the word	447	-murderers, all that perish are	561
"raining"	452	-destruction is the worst destruction	561
Rod, God's	594	one's, better to be given up to the devil than to	561
Rods, the, of our affliction, by whom chosen	442	Selfishness, condemned	421
"Root of Ephraim"	414	Seneca, important quotation from	332
Roots, sinners' and nations', God has his time to dry them up	414	Sensual pleasures, their daughter	9
Rottenness," "to the house of Judah as	296	negligent ministers usually become	235
Ruin, God sometimes permits some revivals before utter	24	Sensuality, its besetting nature	234
our, how sometimes prepared and accomplished	25	Servants, merciful provision for them in the Jewish dispensation	113, 114
no privileges can save the disobedient from	592	Service, the, of God's people is easy	484
no fortifications can secure a sinful people from	598	admonition to those who serve a hard	540
Rulers, their duty to their people	256	love will carry through long	540
		Services, God has no need of our	123
S		all our, must be rendered to God	632
Sabbaths, the principal Jewish	112	Shalman	459
Sacrifice," "mercy and not	328—330	Shame, four things which principally cause	259
remarks respecting the preferring of mercy to	330—332	Shameless, the, in evil, there is little hope of	80
Sacrifices, three things observable in the our, remarks respecting	189	Sickness, a thorough acquaintance with our spiritual,
in what sense termed "flesh"	290	would lead us to prize gospel-mercy	652
Saints, the, remarks on their condition	34	Silver," "their pleasant places for their	395
are the seed of God	49	Similarities, remarks on	537
God's, shall have their day	50	Simplicity, sinful, inconsistent with true godliness	349 should at all times entertain good thoughts of God	83	Sin, its wasting nature	72, 419, 595
remains of sin in	87	and joy, no true union between	126 their mourning, a preparation for a jubilee	114	hastilizes men	105
the, should encourage themselves in their ultimate reward	125	will introduce trouble into the most pleasant places	135
their afflictions, doors of hope	135	restraint includes not mortification of	217 their removal a heavy judgment	252	its progressive character	220, 357
their falls especially considered by the wicked	277	"they eat up the sin of my people"	228
their afflictions are rebukes	289	God sometimes punishes sin with	240 their healing, a fruit of God's mercy	311	of parents often punished in the offspring	240
God's presence constitutes their morning	318	its fruit	276 their sins in breaking covenant are most aggravated sins	335	men more readily see their wound than their	299
their privilege in prayer	496	disturbs heaven and earth	305 cause the mitigation of judgments	502	God, in punishing, manifests his remembrance of	341
their example	507	drunkenness is an old court-	345
in their greatest troubles, God sometimes appears as the enemy of his dearest	513	God will be hot in judgment, when men are hot in	346
the, their comfort founded on the covenant	519	in what its great evil consists	351
the strongest, require a renewal of the promises	519	duties should mightily engage us against	352
Salvation of a sinner, importance of it in God's sight	494	God remembers the first and chief actors in	373
God must be acknowledged in all	552	imputation of	407, 408, 602
Samaria, description of	595	exceeding sinful in the midst of the testimonies of
Samaria's king, his doom	437	God's mercies	410
Sanctification, remarks on	622	the fearful evil of	442
Sanctified use of God's threatenings and judgments	627	God's old mercies are aggravations to	463
Satan, a special device of	581	puts God to a stand	494
Saul, character of	572	the least, not to be ventured on for the greatest gain	529
School of Christ, the first form in it	584	of covetousness	532
Scorners, Latimer's sentiments respecting	95	will bring down men's honours	546
sensual courtiers are generally	345	idolatry is a very growing	550
Scripture-language, its modesty	582	some remarks on it in its own nature and with respect to God	582
		the bitterness of	599
		corrupts blessings	619
		God in a four-fold manner heals	618
		is both a sickness and a wound	650
		the proper passions and effects of most diseases meet in	650 characteristics of the Physician of	651
		Sinful acquisitions cursed	125
		actions of men, God's influence and providence in the	669
		Sinfulness after great mercies greatly aggravates our sin	352
		Sinners, old, exhortation to, with some encouragement for	193

	PAGE		PAGE
Simiers, God has a set time to reckon with	285	"Take away all iniquity," three things desired in these words	622
God's sufferance of their prosperity	359, 364	Tears before God become the bravest	517
in their self-created troubles, complain much	369	Temple at Jerusalem, three things which made it holy	383
their holy duties are aggravations of their sins	382	Temples, what constitutes the sin of building	383
the highest, to what compared in Scripture	437	Teraphim, what it was	192
rich, why God is especially angry with	558	Tertullian quoted	30 their destruction to be especially attributed to themselves	560	de Habitu Muliebri	63
presumptuous, appeal to them	631	de Velandis Virginibus	63
Sins, youth's, may prove the terrors of age	13	de Corona Militis	151
small, to be heedfully avoided	25	de Adulteria	216 deliberate, the most shameful	81	Tertullian's sentiments respecting adulterers	216
afflictions sanctified bring men to see and acknowledge their	306	Testament, the Rhemist, quoted	146
mere confession of, not sufficient	306	Texts, some, are plainer unexplained	550 of saints in breaking covenant, are aggravated	335	Thankful obedience of true conversion	629
sins	359	Thanksgivings, remarks on	101
God knows how to make use of men's	411	Thought sins	232 provoking God's hatred are dreadful	422	Thoughts, some helps against discouraging	501 should not increase with mercies	441	exhortation against	501 of ancestors continued in, are aggravated	441	Threatening, individual, effectual	223 greatness of men's, hinder not the working of God's mercies	493	Threatenings, prosperity usually leads men to forget all God's, always contain mercy on repentance, either expressed or implied	63
special, must be reformed in our turning to God	524	God is sincere in his	290
some, provoke God more than others	542	Time, in which God will not have mercy	16
eight, which especially bring judgments on our posterity	602	God has a, in which he will bring peace to his church	36
men's, some aggravations of, enumerated	351, 466, 473, 474, 481, 482, 486, 502, 522, 534, 536, 541, 548, 552, 560, 563, 600	of God's reviving his people, is long neither in God's nor in his saints' account	312
Son, a, the privileges of	593	God's, must be waited for, to derive comfort from his mercies	358
"Sons of the living God," what is implied in the expression	33, 35	the acceptable	451
of God not exempt from grievous trials	464	Times, in the most corrupt, God usually reserves a people	56
Soul-worship must be preferred before all other worship	333	of trouble, a few props to lean on in	311
Sound, denunciation of threatenings in God's name, is a terrible	354	of afflictions, are night times	318
Sour, "their drink is	256	of deliverance are morning	318
Spirit, the bravest, tears before God become	517	of feasting, are times of danger	314, 345
Staff used in a peculiar form of idolatry	236	when public evils are threatened, good times to die in	409
State, a, its members should act towards it as a mother	58	of prosperity, their danger	425
Stedfastness, difficulties try	441	Titles, their influence	397
in the true worship when others fall off is commendable	505	Trading, oppression in	528
Stirrings of mercy should prevail in our hearts, more than stirrings of wrath	499	Travailing, a woman, a frequent similitude in Scripture	582
Straits, sanctified, a cause of rejoicing	143	Treachery, "they have dealt	281
ignorance of God's mind in, grievous to the saints	191	Trees, reasons for sacrificing nuder	239
it is God's usual way to help his people in their greatest	267	Trouble, a few props to lean on in times of	311
Strength, bodily, restored should lead to increase of spiritual	352	we should beware of an impatient spirit in times of	312
when God strives against any he gives correspondent	515	the way to be safe in times of	616
Strivings, success at last will recompense all our	516	objects of trust in times of, must have certain qualifications	646
Strokes, God's second, are usually more dreadful than the first	17	some considerations for times of	681
Stubborn, idolaters' hearts are	267	Trumpets, the feast of, its use threefold	119
Succession, a, in wickedness God cannot endure	77	ministers should bow their	120
Success, men ordinarily think the magnitude of the sin lessened by its	533	Truth, multitudes no argument against the clearly proved should be yielded to	59
Sufferings, in the heaviest, a truly penitent heart entertains good thoughts of God	310	Truths, unnecessary, not to be imperatively enforced	483
Superstition, some signs of	384	Tumults, are a token of the great wrath of God on a people	457
Superstitions vanities caused by low thoughts of God	177	causes of	457
the, are abundant and costly in their services	278	miseries of	458
altars should be removed	424	Turning to God, a united, is very honourable	310
Supremacy, oath of, its origin	44	"Turn thou to thy God"	524
the king has some, both in civil and church affairs	45	Tyrus, remarks on	406
Swearers, how punished by Louis the Ninth	212
Swearing, enormity of the sin of	211, 212	U
Sword, the continuation of it on a people is a sore judgment	486	Uncertainty of things temporal	102, 122
the, has its commission from God	487	Uclean, the, pursue with greediness their lusts	84
Sympathy of God for his people	520	God has a special controversy with	216
		sometimes make a show of religion	243
		Uncleanness, a reproach to any family	241
		Understandings of men avail little in matters of worship and of faith	550
		admonition against trusting in matters of faith and worship to our own	551
		Undertakings, unlawful, cannot prosper	233
		Unfaithfulness, provokes rejection from God	226
		ours to God felt when those near to us are unfaithful to us	241
		Union, the stability of the church	38
		Universality not the mark of the true church	39
		Unlovely, the, he means they use to purchase love	366
		Unsettled, an, spirit, a judgment	415
		Unsteadfastness of our hearts	631
		Uprightly, he walks surely that walks	12

T

Tabernacles, the feast of, three things chiefly aimed at in	121, 122
Table, duties of the second, must be regarded as well as duties of the first	524
Tabor	263
"Take away all iniquity," five duties which spring from these words	621, 622

	PAGE		PAGE
Urim and Thummim, remarks on the	191	Will of man, its native obstinacy, by what means subdued	672
Use, its effects on men's minds	548	Willing obedience in evil brings much guilt on a people	395
V
Vacuum, the worst possible	418	Wind, the, who may be said to sow what is denoted by feeding on creature comforts will prove but "an east"	507 507 591
Vanity of man's estate	219	Wine of wrath	442
proud men	551	Wisdom, its twofold character	680
Violence in sin entails violence in judgments	416	of men, on what expended	680
Visitation, God has his days of	232	Withdrawings of God from his saints, in what they consist	280
W
Wait on God, how we are to	526	Witnesses to his truth, God has never been without	506
some reasons why we should	526, 527	Wives of ministers, remarks on	8
exhortation to	527	Word, the, when it fails God has other means to convince of God, the only sure guide	68
Wantonness after deliverance from oppression is very sinful	482	in what respects it is said to slay of God, its power and efficacy	325, 684 327, 350
Wantons usually grow past feeling	81	the written, alone, is sufficient warrant for forms of worship	373
Wants of every kind, the supply must be from heaven for	661	the, its superiority to all other books	374
War, its signification in Scripture	350	sent especially to the church	375
sad, in which the conqueror must lament the conquest	385	is full and perfect	375
Warning, the, to Lo-rubamah implies two things usually precedes smiting	23 597	contains matter to exercise the greatest minds	377
Warnings, divers, used by God	597	unfailing nature of its promises	389
Water, holy, the heathens had their	148	where it converts not, it hardens	467
Way, evangelical, of seeking God	195	end of its ministry	490
but one, leading to an eternity of happiness	225	wilful inattention to it a great evil	490
the, of God's people often very difficult	468, 497	of God, caution regarding our use of it	683
Ways, God will deal with men according to their present	269	Work, a, its matter may be rewarded, its manner cursed	11
the, of the Lord are right	678, 682	God provides suitable agents for his	546
Whirlwind, the, by whom justly reaped	364	Works, God's, cautious respecting them	497
Whoredom, bodily or spiritual, especially shameful some of its effects on its votaries	80, 81	our good, wrought by God	677
Tertullian's sentiments respecting	81	Worship, false, the more specious, the more dangerous defiled, defiles the soul	246 290 is a costly sin	124	false, especial source of oppression	274
bodily and spiritual, usually conjoined	235	and tyranny, necessary union between them	336
Whoredoms, "the spirit of"	236, 273	the greatest gain should not draw us to every age adds something to forms of, must be warranted by the written word	367 372
Wicked men, God uses, yet punishes	11	God's, its importance	373
when God comes on them with wrath, his wrath is unmix'd with mercy	74	impure, fearful for the saints to join in	390
whether their help can lawfully be used in any case	300	in God's, the word should guide us	398 children are a great dishonour to their parents	251	false, is a great sin	438 difference between God's dealings with the godly, and with the	74	God's true, elevates	491
the great, God regards with contempt	126	Worshippers, the true, their service should be proportioned to their ability	422, 423
to obey the unlawful commands of governors	342	their duty to their families	432
the, their temporal prosperity should not disquiet us	367, 531	Wrath, when called to reveal God's, we should conceal our own	7
remarks on their prosperity	533	what is meant by pure	74, 75
their activity and spiritual death co-exist	547	God's, its extent	219
a fourfold act of God in their actions	594	some of its effects on men here	298
Wickedness has many covers	104	most fearful	439, 559
God has a time to discover	104	in what sense termed the wide of his wrath	442
studied, the worst	232	God rejoices in the execution of his	442
God's best ordinances are corrupted by man's	335	God's, on a nation, tumults betwixt it	457
plotted, the most vile	336	proportioned to the sin of man	460
much, often lies hid in people	339	difference between God and man in the execution of	500
long ago committed, God remembers	340	Wreaths, some, of the bands of God's love	476
a vile, to flatter princes	342	Y
obstinacy in, a great sin	401	Years, expressed by days, why	201 its defenders must at last perish	401	Young, the, sometimes employed about great works	4
of men, strangely contrasted with God's goodness	553	God takes it exceedingly ill that any should corrupt the	284
Wife, "a, of whoredoms"	78	Youth, dedicated to God, how sweet the fruits of exhortation to godly	117 136
a good, though portionless, is a great blessing	540	sins of, may prove the terrors of age	13
Wilderness state of the church	130	Z
how God may be said to have known Israel in the	553	Zeal, Jehu's, its character	11
of men, a very great aggravation	81	of idolaters	84, 252, 366
precedes ruin	81
Will of man, and God's grace, concord between them	670
God's act upon it twofold, and mode in which effected	671

